Minnesota became the ninth State to abolish racial discrimination in the National Guard. On November 22 1949, the Governor of Minnesota issued a proclamation establishing "equality of opportunity," without segregation, in the Minnesota National Guard (Executive Order C–19).[25]

Progress in labor laws: Noteworthy advances were made during 1949 in State laws regulating workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, protection of women workers and children, and disability compensation.

Each of the 44 States whose legislatures met, and Hawaii, improved their workmen's compensation laws in one or more respects, principally by increasing benefits. For example, 37 States and Hawaii increased benefits for death or some type of disability by raising the maximum weekly payment, extending the number of weeks for such payments, increasing the maximum percentage of wages for computing benefits, or increasing the aggregate maximum amount of benefits permitted. Benefits for death and for all types of disability were increased in 25 of the States and Hawaii. Medical-aid benefits were liberalized in 19 States and Hawaii. Two States, New York and Washington, adopted new disability compensation laws. The 1949 developments in this field also indicate a trend toward fuller coverage of occupational diseases.[26]

Statutory minimum wages for all workers were increased in two States, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and in the Territory of the Virgin Islands.

The outstanding trends in unemployment insurance were laws increasing benefit amounts and decreasing employers' contribution rates. Two States, Texas and Massachusetts, extended the coverage to include respectively governmental workers and maritime workers.[27]

Protective legislation for working women and children included the following: Maine, Tennessee, and Alaska adopted new child-labor laws. Under these laws, a basic minimum age of 16 years, for full-time employment, is established, thus making in all 22 States, in addition to Alaska and Puerto Rico, having this standard. All three of the new acts also improve maximum-hours-of work standards, Tennessee and Alaska setting an 8-hour day, 40-hour week, 5-day week for minors under 18 years of age, while Maine established an 8-hour day, 48-hour week, 6-day week for minors under 16 years of age.

These acts provide in addition that special hour regulations shall now apply to employed children under 16 years of age who are attending school as well as working. The Tennessee and Alaska laws prohibit night work for minors under 16. The Maine law eliminates a former night-work prohibition for minors under 16. Three other States—Indiana, Ohio, and Wisconsin—passed laws in 1949 modifying previous child-labor standards. The Indiana law permits girls of 16 to 17 years of age to work until 9 p. m. instead of formerly to 7 p. m. on 2 evenings a week in stores under vocational-education programs. The Ohio and Wisconsin laws revise former minimum-age standards regulating the employment of minors in certain public exhibitions.[28]

Laws specifically protecting the rights of women workers were of two kinds. Three States—California, Connecticut, and Maine—and the Territory of Alaska, enacted legislation requiring the payment of equal wages to women for comparable work, thereby making 13 jurisdictions having laws abolishing discrimination in wages because of sex. Three States improved the working hours of women. Wider coverage is provided for the restrictions on hours of work for women under Maine law. In Wyoming, female employees in certain occupations requiring continuous standing are given two rest periods of 15 minutes each day. A Tennessee law establishes a maximum 50-hour week for women workers.[29]

Compulsory school attendance: Four States made major changes in their compulsory-school-attendance provisions, namely, Idaho, Michigan, Oklahoma, and Wisconsin. The Idaho law lowers the upper age from 18 to 16 years for required school attendance, but strengthens existing law by eliminating the exceptions under which minors under 16 years of age were formerly excused from school attendance. Under the 1949 law, only children physically or mentally incapacitated may be excused. The Wisconsin law also eliminates the exceptions for children under 16, now permitting only high school graduates to leave school under that age. Michigan eliminated a provision under which formerly children of 14 and 15, whose services were needed for the support of their family or for themselves, might be excused from school to go to work. Under the new Oklahoma law, provision is made that unless minors between the ages of 17 and 18 years are high school graduates, they are required to attend school. The previous provision permitted children of 16 and 17 to be excused from school for employment, if they had completed the first 8 grades of school.

A number of States established new minimum school terms. Georgia and South Dakota extended their school terms to 9 months; North Dakota and Nebraska to 8 months; Delaware from 160 days to 180 days. The North Carolina Legislature repealed previous legislation under which the public schools of Currituck County might be closed in order to allow pupils to pick cotton.[30]

Voting: Two acts relating to voting by employees were adopted during 1949. A Nebraska law permits employees to be absent for 2 hours to vote in any election, instead of only in primary elections. An Arkansas act makes it a misdemeanor to attempt to influence the vote of an employee by discharge or threat of discharge from employment. The State of Tennessee, one of the seven States requiring the payment of a poll tax for voting, enacted legislation in 1949 (1) exempting women and blind persons from the payment of the poll tax; (2) abolishing payment of it as a prerequisite for voting in primary elections for certain political nominations; and (3) limiting the time for the collection of delinquent poll taxes. South Carolina moved in 1949 to submit the issue of a poll tax as a requirement for voting to a general election to be held in 1950 (J. Res. 347). Similar moves on the part of the legislatures of Texas and Virginia were defeated in the November 1949 elections in those States.[31]

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT SIXTH SESSION OF COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

"The Economic and Social Council notes that the Commission on Human Rights considers that the draft international Covenant on Human Rights relating to some of the fundamental rights of the individual and to certain essential civil freedoms is the first of the series of covenants and measures to be adopted in order to cover the whole of the universal declaration of human rights; notes further, the decision of the Commission to proceed at its seventh session with the consideration of additional covenants and measures dealing with economic, social, cultural, political, and other categories of human rights, and to consider additional proposed articles included in annex III to its report of the sixth session, together with any other articles which might be further proposed by governments; and approves the decision of the Commission."

"The Economic and Social Council, considering that the Commission on Human Rights, at its sixth session, resolved to begin at once the preparation of the execution of its work program for the year 1951, with a view to assuring to everyone the enjoyment of economic, social, and cultural rights set forth in articles 22 to 27 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, having noted with interest the report submitted by the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization on regulations concerning economic and social rights in the International Covenant on Human Rights (E/1752 and E/1752/Corr. 1), requests the Secretary-General—

"(a) To transmit to the International Labor Organization the proposals for relevant articles on economic and social rights contained in annex III to the report of the sixth session of the Commission on Human Rights, together with the summary records of the debates in the Commission concerning the inclusion of economic and social rights in the draft covenant or covenants on human rights,[32] so that the said specialized agency may submit to the Secretary-General, before the seventh session of the Commission on Human Rights, a detailed report on what has already been achieved in these fields, what still remains to be achieved and how it might be accomplished;

"(b) To make the necessary arrangements for obtaining any collaboration he may think desirable from the other organs of the United Nations and the other specialized agencies; and

"(c) To submit to the Commission on Human Rights, before its seventh session to be held in 1951, a report on the information and observations thus obtained, together with any documentation he may consider relevant."

"The Economic and Social Council, considering the need for thorough and precise information relating to the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities, requests the Secretary-General—

"(a) To invite governments, members, and nonmembers of the United Nations (i) to furnish him, as soon as practicable, examples (with appropriate citations, where possible) of legislation, judicial decisions, and other types of action which have been found to be especially useful in that country in preventing discrimination in one or more of the fields covered by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; (ii) to furnish him, as soon as practicable, full information regarding the protection of any minority within their jurisdiction by legislative measures and in the light of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; and (iii) to furnish him, in particular, such information as could serve as a basis for defining the term 'minorities.'

"(b) To distribute the information received from government in response to this invitation to the members of the Subcommission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities prior to its fourth session."

"The Economic and Social Council believing that education plays a great part in the prevention of discrimination, and that positive and lasting results in preventing discrimination are attainable in educational establishments, affirming its conviction that one of the principal goals of education should be to eliminate all forms of discrimination and to eradicate such prejudices as may lead to the commission of acts of discrimination, emphasizing that considerable assistance in this matter may be given by nongovernmental organizations and private institutions, noting with satisfaction the initiative taken in this field by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the improvement of textbooks and teaching materials, in the conduct of educational seminars, in the training of teaching personnel, and in the preparation of a statement on race from the viewpoint of present scientific knowledge, recommends that member states—

"(a) Adopt measures to be applied in educational establishments designed to eliminate discrimination;

"(b) Distribute the books and pamphlets referred to in subparagraph (b) below as widely as possible among all their peoples; and

"(c) Introduce, insofar as possible, the ideas contained in the books or pamphlets referred to in subparagraph (b) below into their education programs; recommends that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization—

"(a) Give emphasis to such practical educational activities as are likely to eradicate prejudice and discrimination, bearing in mind the opportunities afforded through adult education;

"(b) Undertake, as soon as practicable, preparation and widest possible dissemination of information through suitable books and pamphlets based on scientific knowledge as well as general moral principles contained in the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

"Ten Days Ago, America, D-Day Dawned in Korea—Over That Embattled Land Roared Bombers in the Most Massive Air Strikes Made Since World War II—They Softened Inchon's Beaches and All Land Approaches to Seoul—B-29's and Giant B-50's Dropped Their 10-Ton Devastating Bombs for the Great Counteroffensive: 'Operation Torch'" (Battle Report, Washington)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, October 4, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, on this eighty-second day of the war, Dr. John R. Steelman, the Assistant to the President, again presents to the Nation, Battle Report, Washington. Nothing that I might say would be complete were I not to avail myself on this occasion to commend the splendid commentaries made in this outstanding teledocumentary by Robert ("Bob") McCormick, one of the National Broadcasting Co.'s ace commentaries well and favorably known to many here in this House. Bob McCormick's style of presentation makes every program of this now nationally famous television series an action program of tremendous interest to the video audience everywhere.

On the occasion of this telecast Dr. Steelman presented Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary of the United States Air Force; Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force; Ambassador Jessup; and John Foster Dulles, consultant to the Secretary of State.

These gentlemen, as Dr. Steelman so aptly stated, "are helping write the history of our era, and, moreover, every hour of every day they are helping to mold a world in which men can live in peace and security."

As special guests Dr. Steelman also presented Col. Dave C. Schilling and Lt. Col. William D. Ritchie, two of America's leading aces in the Eighth Air Force in World War II. These intrepid flyers are the Air Force officers who flew the F-84 Thunderjets and successfully negotiated the 3,600-mile ocean hop which constituted the first nonstop trans-Atlantic flight ever made by jet-propelled planes—and they made the journey across the ocean in 10 hours and 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize the fact that Secretary Finletter in his address stated that the first task of the Air Force was to defend these United States; second to that he said it was to conduct strategic counterattacks; third, to lend tactical air support and in every manner in all that that operation implies to all branches of our ground troops; and fourth, to transport by air all the men and matériel needful and necessary to the complete functioning of our great war machine in its entirety and in all branches of the service which calls upon the Air Force for that assistance.

In each of these—

Secretary Finletter went on to say—

the Air Force seeks to associate the other armed services with it to the maximum extent possible, for our Defense Establishment is and must be always primarily a force for peace.

From the beginning to the end of Sunday's program, every word spoken was of tremendous interest to the membership of this House and to the American people in general.

I am sure all present will find particular interest in the talk made by Ambassador Philip C. Jessup, in which he commented upon the accomplishments of the meeting between Mr. Bevin, Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, Mr. Schuman, Foreign Minister of France, and our own Secretary of State Dean Acheson. These proceedings he summed up in this significant statement:

This week we have made clear to our allies that we mean every word that we have spoken and are anxious to act now to create the strength in Europe which is vital to protect all of us * * * against an attack against any one of us.

Mr. Speaker, because of the tremendous import of this Battle Report, Washington to the Americans everywhere, under unanimous consent, I extend my remarks and include therein the seventh of the series of teledocumentary reports made by John R. Steelman, Assistant to the President, in collaboration with the National Broadcasting Co.

The telecast was as follows:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

Mr. MCCORMICK. As war moves swiftly to a fiery climax in Korea, NBC television calls into focus its cameramen in United Nations—in Inchon on the road to Seoul, and here in the Nation's Capital—to bring you once again your Battle Report, Washington.

Washington—far removed in space from the flaming peninsula dividing the Sea of Japan and the Yellow Sea—but scene of mounting action to back drop the battle of men and guns.

Today, we draw our battle report from men who guide the destiny of our Air Force, and men equally vital on our diplomatic front. But first, we turn to one—familiar by dint of his unique position as the Assistant to the President—with all that concerns us at the Nation's Capital this eighty-second day of war—Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. Another week has passed and the fight for peace and freedom continues. On the military front brave men are fighting and dying under appalling conditions. On the diplomatic front, other courageous men are engaged in another struggle to bring the dawn of peace.

And, all over the world men are asking: Why; why cannot nations live in peace; why cannot they cooperate to create a world of plenty?

The answer is obvious. A small group of greedy men with an insatiable lust for power have poisoned the minds of millions. In every place where they can find a foothold they preach the doctrine of hate and destruction. Even their ridiculous claim that they advocate peace is permeated with falsehoods and colored with venom. Ruthlessly they have sent millions to their graves and if they are not stopped, all the world will become a slave camp. The free nations of the world have united against them and are echoing the immortal words that rang through France when the Germans were at the gate of Verdun in World War I, "They shall not pass."

This afternoon you will hear from both the military and the diplomatic fronts. Secretary Finletter and General Vandenberg will tell us how the Air Force is doing its part. Ambassador Jessup and John Foster Dulles, consultant to the Secretary of State, will take us behind the scenes and report to us on the meetings of the General Assembly of the United Nations and the Foreign Ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty nations.

These men are helping to write the history of our era and every hour of every day they are helping to mold a world in which men can live in peace and prosperity.

As special guests this afternoon, we have with us Col. David C. Schilling and Lt. Col. William D. Ritchie, of the United States Air Force. These intrepid fliers are the two who flew F–84 jet planes across the Atlantic last Friday. The wrote aviation history and are here now to tell us about it.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Ten days ago, America, D-day dawned in Korea. Out of the mist over that embattled land roared bombers in the most massive air strike since World War II, softening Inchon's beaches and all land approaches to Seoul, B–29's and giant B–50's dropped their 10-ton devastating bombs to give literal meaning to the name selected for this first major United Nations counter offensive: Operation Torch. Behind these bombers that gave such heart and help to the marines storming the Korean shore, our men charged with a larger responsibility: that of maintaining our air power as a force for peace in the world. And here to tell us of some the plans involved in that increasingly vital role is the Secretary of the Air Force himself, Thomas K. Finletter.

Mr. FINLETTER. The Air Force of today has a tremendous responsibility as a member of our defense establishment. It has a tremendous responsibility not only to this Nation, but to the preservation of peace in the world.

In my 5 months as Air Force Secretary, I have become firmly convinced that a strong and well trained Air Force is essential. This is so because the Air Force is an integral part of the over-all Military Establishment, which must be built up, not because of the fight in Korea, but because of the general international situation. Even a successful ending of the Korean war must not give us a false sense of security. Until the basic tensions between the Communists and the free world are greatly reduced, adequate armed strength is an all-compelling need to guarantee survival of the free nations.

Specifically, the Air Force has a major responsibility for four main tasks. These are: first, the defense of the United States; second, the strategic counter-attack; third, tactical air support; and fourth, air transport. In each of these, the Air Force seeks to associate the other services with it to the maximum extent possible.

The present plan for the Air Force is a basic increase from the present 48-group level to 58-group level, with a projection toward 69 groups. Even with the 69 groups we must not become complacent, but must be clearly alert to developing better planes, better weapons, and better trained personnel so to stand ever ready as a deterrent to any aggressor nation and as a force for victory should war still prove unavoidable.

In all of this building of weapons for war I want to emphasize that we are making these preparations in spite of the fact that peace is the primary objective of our Nation. We all hope for the day when military preparations can be safely reduced to a force which will police those of the world who have not yet learned to behave themselves.

We all must understand fully that the objective of this American Defense Establishment, of which the Air Force is an integral part, is to deter war and reduce the chances of it by making clear to those who might think of war that it would be an error to attack us. Our Defense Establishment is, and must be always, primarily a force for peace.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Nothing on earth of the slightest value to the enemy is sacred to a pilot on a strafing mission. One after another as the targets leap into view, the strafing planes "go to town," adding their own specialized talent to the heavier work of their bomber brothers, all for the same purpose, to cripple the enemy and tear his supply line to shreds. By last week, as we threw our Sunday punch, the Communist Koreans had come to have a healthy respect for the deadly facility of the strafers as they now have for every arm of our Air Force. And for this, no little credit goes to the man from whom we hear next.

General VANDENBERG. Mr. Finletter has told you of the world-wide responsibilities of the Air Force. I should like to emphasize that we intend to keep this major responsibility firmly in mind, even though we are now concentrating on the Korean situation.

As the Secretary has said, we feel firmly that a strong Air Force, as a part of a strong Defense Establishment, is a most effective deterrent to war. It is also vital to victory should war occur in spite of our efforts for peace.

The Air Force has inflicted powerful blows against the Communists in Korea. I say this, not because I am Chief of Staff of the Air Force, but because the facts bear me out. From General MacArthur down to the soldiers in the line have come high praises for the effectiveness of the Air Force units which have been operating over Korea. This applies to the units which have operated in close tactical air support, in strategic bombardment, in air transport, and in air rescue service.

In spite of the initial success of the Communists, the United Nations forces were not driven out of Korea. There has been neither another Bataan nor another Dunkerque. Vastly outnumbered troops fought a skillful delaying action and have now turned to the offensive. Our troops have complete freedom from hostile air power. Our bombers have neutralized all significant strategic targets in North Korea. The enemy's main lines of transportation have been cut and then cut again. The enemy's supply movement is almost at a standstill. Since the last days of June, the Communist spearheads have been under vigorous and unremitting attack by our fighter-bombers. All of this has been accomplished by some 88 consecutive days of all-out air support of United Nations forces which have totaled more than 33,000 effective United States Air Force combat sorties.

Effective as the Air Force action in Korea has been, I should like to emphasize again that the Air Force has no delusions about air power doing the job alone. No one in authority in the Air Force has ever said this could be the case. The Air Force is a part of air-land-sea team, of which no one unit is more important than the others.

In addition, I would like to emphasize that air power can never guarantee that enemy planes may not deliver atomic bombs to American cities should war come to this Nation. Just as Germany, at the peak of its air power, was unable to force the turn-back short of the target of a single one of our bomber strikes, we cannot expect to prevent all enemy planes from getting through.

Since this is so, our strategic Air Force must be ready to reinforce the defense by carrying the fight to the enemy.

With the build-up from 58 to 69 groups, which Mr. Finletter has described, we will have an Air Force which will command even greater respect from any aggressor nation who may be watching us. I pledge the efforts of myself and all Air Force personnel to see to it that this Air Force, whatever its strength will be, is as well-trained and as alert to its responsibilities as is humanly possible. I pledge this, both for the preservation of peace and the defense of our Nation should the need come.

Mr. MCCORMICK. While the battle waxes hot in the Pacific (and the Nation fixed attention upon Wolmi, Kimpo, and Seoul), here on the other side of the world men met in critical conference with their eyes on Europe—first, the Big Three ministers in suite 37-A in the Waldorf Astoria in New York, and later, 12 nations representing one-seventh of the world's population. Object, to make forbiddingly stronger that "all for one and one for all" fellowship designed to deter Communist aggression.

Accompanying Secretary Acheson to these conferences was Philip C. Jessup, our Ambassador-at-Large. As these vital meetings recessed, he sat before our NBC television cameras that we might bring you this film report of what has transpired to date. America, Ambassador Jessup.

Mr. JESSUP. The presence in New York of Mr. Bevin, the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom; Mr. Schuman, Foreign Minister of France; and Secretary of State Acheson made possible a meeting of the so-called Big Three—the foreign secretaries of the three states which have occupation troops in western Germany. The many actions which the three ministers took last week reflected their desire to take important further steps in the process of integrating the Federal Republic of Germany into the community of free nations. These actions mark a new phase in the relations between the occupying powers of Germany. The ministers agreed to grant more authority to the Federal Republic, including more control over its foreign affairs. Provision was also made for the creation of a mobile German police force to increase the internal security of the republic without altering the rights of the occupying force. The ministers agreed to seek the termination of the state of war with Germany. This decision is part of the over-all objective of normalizing relations with the republic and progressively returning Germany to partnership in western Europe.

The 12 members of the North Atlantic Council were also hard at work last week in New York on the problem of preventing war by strengthening the military forces of the free world in Europe. Secretary of State Acheson made a revolutionary proposal which was welcomed by the other ministers to create an integrated army in Europe as soon as possible. This army would be made up of contingents from each of the 12 members of the North Atlantic Treaty organizations. The additional forces which President Truman said on September 9 would be sent to Europe would be the first United States contribution to the new combined army. These American troops, as well as the forces sent by the other treaty states, would be commanded by one man who would have a staff to assist him made up of officers from the states which have contributed forces. The supplying and financing of this new army would be the joint responsibility of all treaty members. The total strength of this integrated force must be equal to the task of keeping Europe free—of forcing any aggressor to ponder long and hard before starting out to conquer Europe.

One of the problems which immediately arises in talking about defense of Europe is how Germany could contribute to this major undertaking. The United States believes that plans for the integrated European force should provide for a contingent from Germany. This definitely does not mean that we would build up a national Germany army or a German General Staff. All agree that this would not serve the best interest of Germany or Europe. The majority of the German people also seem to share this view, but the United States does think that Germans should be allowed to take part in the joint defense of Europe through participation in an integrated force.

The North Atlantic Council discussed these problems this week and then recessed for a few days to give the ministers time to explain the plans to their governments. The ministers, most of whom are now attending the sessions of the United Nations General Assembly in New York, will meet again in a week or so to decide on ways of speeding up the creation of a strong enough military force in Europe to discourage any power from breaking the peace. During the interval Mr. Moch and Mr. Shinwell, the French and British Ministers of Defense, have come to the United States and have talked with Secretary of Defense Marshall and Messrs. Acheson, Bevin, and Schuman.

All of you will be hearing a great deal more about this plan for an integrated defense force in Europe because our contributions to making this force strong and efficient would mean sacrifices for all of us. The United States as well as every treaty member must deny itself many things in order to meet the challenge to free peoples everywhere. We must be ready to do our part as others do theirs.

When the United States signed the North Atlantic Treaty we agreed that our freedom was linked to the freedom of the western European states. This week we have made clear to our allies that we mean every word that we have said and are anxious to act now to create the strength in Europe which is vital to protect all of us against an attack against any one of us.

Mr. McCORMICK. As the talks Ambassador Jessup describes were temporarily halted in New York, and the United Nations happily studied the "miles gained" by its liberating forces in Korea, last Tuesday the General Assembly of the United Nations met again in session. With the arrival of Russia's Andrei Vishinsky to take his place beside television's new Hooper-rating star, Jacob Malik, the world got set for another ride on the "black is white and white is black" merry-go-round. Member of the United States delegation to the General Assembly is John Foster Dulles, consultant to the Secretary of State. Here is a sound-on-film report from Mr. Dulles, made especially for Battle Report, Washington.

Mr. DULLES. The General Assembly of the United Nations is now under way. It is the most important gathering that has been held since San Francisco 5 years ago. This Assembly is going to decide whether the free world can organize enough unity to hold together, or whether it is going to be pulled apart in pieces little by little. Of course, we've got United Nation's action in Korea today to try to save one of the small countries from being overrun by aggression. But it is pretty much an accident that the United Nations is able to act in Korea. It just happened that Russia was boycotting the Security Council when it came up, so that it couldn't veto the Security Council resolution that called on all the members to help in Korea. It also happened that the United States had a considerable amount of military power in nearby Japan because it was an occupying force there. But in the future, we can't let the security of the free world depend upon the coincidence of these lucky chances. We have got to get the United Nations organized so that there will always be somebody on the job, and so that there will always be some force to bring into play at decisive points to withstand aggression. At this Assembly, our delegation of the United States, under the leadership of Secretary of State Acheson, has made a very momentous proposal for accomplishing that organization to creating a standing and an alert world-wide peace patrol with military force to back it up. Under that proposal, the Assembly would have observers at danger points throughout the world so as to keep the United Nations informed as to what is going on and so they can see possible threats of aggression. It would be what you might call the eyes and ears by the United Nations. And then back of that we want to have all of the members bring into being some military strength which can be earmarked for use in united action on behalf of the United Nations, and we want those military forces trained and equipped so that they can consolidate and fight together with standa ilized equipment.

Now into a different language, etc., so that they can really be an effective whole. If we can do those things that would mean that there wouldn't be any repetition of the Korean affair where the entire burden of the resistance falls almost entirely upon the United States as in the case today. And now, in order to get all of that into action, we've got to some way meet the situation that there might be a veto in the Security Council. So we proposed that the United Nations Assembly should always be ready to meet on 24 hours notice in case a veto in the Security Council prevents the Security Council calling upon the member states there for action. And through that combination we believe we can really consolidate the strength of the free world and deter aggression. We want to have this program which is designed to strengthen the United Nations. It is going to involve cost and effort by all the nations, but security cannot be had cheaply, and no nation is entitled to United Nations protection unless it is prepared to share the burden of common effort. We have heard a lot of talk in this country, and in other countries, about making United Nations strong. Well a lot of those people will now have a chance to work for it. The nations here will have a chance to stand up and be counted as to whether they want security in words or security as a free right, or whether they are really willing to do what it takes.

Mr. McCORMICK. High over the North Atlantic less than 48 hours ago two American pilots, each flying an F–84 Thunderjet, on a 3,600-mile ocean hop in the Air Force's first attempt, were refueled by such new-devised magic as this. Result—the first nonstop trans-Atlantic flight by a jet-propelled plane. Time—from Manston Air Base in England to the United States of America—10 hours and 1 minute. Lt. Col. Bill Ritchie was forced to bail out when he ran out of fuel approaching Labrador. Col. Dave Schilling made it to Limestone, Maine. Both pilots are with me now in their first television appearance since their dramatic, history-making flight. And, to start off, Colonel Schilling, tell us something about this trip. I know it isn't pleasant to sit in one of those things where you can't move your head and you can't bend over. How was it, was it pretty dull, or what?

Colonel SCHILLING. No, we were pretty busy. We had a lot of work to do in navigating. We had enough freedom to move to not make it too uncomfortable. We had very excellent emergency equipment and ventilating eqiupment—suits to keep us cool, and keep down perspiration.

Mr. McCORMICK. So it wasn't really as much torture as we might imagine. Well, now according to the stories I have read, Colonel Ritchie, the reason you had to bail out was because you missed your air tanker and couldn't refuel, was that right?

Colonel RITCHIE. No, I had no trouble making rendezvous with the tanker; I just couldn't accept fuel.

Mr. McCORMICK. What do you mean you couldn't accept—a mechanical problem, or——

Colonel RITCHIE. My refueling equipment was damaged over Iceland.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, I see. In other words, you met the tanker, but you just couldn't take the fuel from them.

Colonel RITCHIE. That's right.

Mr. McCORMICK. What sort of refueling device is used on this sort of thing, Colonel Schilling?

Colonel SCHILLING. It is a British probe drogue method. It is a funnel on the end of a hose which has a probe mounted on the front side of the receiver aircraft which grabs in and makes contact.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, does the tanker fly above the plane it is refueling, or below it, or what?

Colonel SCHILLING. No, he flies above and just ahead.

Mr. McCORMICK. And just ahead; well, what sort of a plane is it—a B–29 they use as a tanker?

Colonel SCHILLING. We used a British Lancaster, Lincoln, and a B–29.

Mr. McCORMICK. And you can slow one of those jets down enough so that a B–29 can keep up with it?

Colonel SCHILLING. Oh yes, they will fly just as well slowly as they do at high speeds.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, how did you bail out, Colonel Ritchie? Physically how—did you have one of those ejection seats that bailed you out?

Colonel RITCHIE. Yes, I used ejection too.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, you did. And you landed in the water, did you?

Colonel RITCHIE. No, I landed over land in a tree.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, well, did you have any sort of protective clothing in case you had landed in the water?

Colonel RITCHIE. Yes. I had this waterproof suit. Fortunately, I didn't have to use it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, we are very happy that you didn't. How long did it take you to refuel?

Colonel RITCHIE. Several minutes—three or four.

Mr. McCORMICK. Just a matter of minutes?

Colonel RITCHIE. Just a matter of minutes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the weather affect you?

Colonel RITCHIE. No, because normally at the altitude you refuel, you are above a large percentage of the weather.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, one more thing. Did you have food and water on this plane?

Colonel RITCHIE. Yes, I had fighter rations and water.

Mr. McCORMICK. Did you use them?

Colonel RITCHIE. Yes, we ate them.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, now, what was this trip suppose to prove?

Colonel RITCHIE. Well, the feasibility of inflight refueling and the possibility of moving a large number of fighter aircraft over large distances in a very short period of time.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, you mean the theory is that if this works, you might be able to move a lot of jets across the ocean all at once?

Colonel RITCHIE. We could move as many over in as many hours as it took us to move 16 over in days.

Mr. McCORMICK. Since you didn't quite make it, do you think the test was a success or not?

Colonel RITCHIE. Yes, I do. Particularly our rescue party.

Mr. McCORMICK. You are most grateful for that? Well—so another Air Force first—the first nonstop trans-Atlantic flight by a jet plane. Time: barely over 10 hours.

Thus the Nation, America—as top diplomatic, Air Force, and executive officials have come before our cameras to report to you—moves into the fourteenth and perhaps the most critical week of the war. And the latest headlines that reflect the heightened action—General Vandenberg has just told me that he has had word on his B–50 missing on flight from Goose Bay to Arizona. The wreckage has not actually been sighted, but an RAF Lancaster, 150 miles southwest of Goose Bay has spotted an unknown number of survivors. Rescue work cannot be undertaken immediately.

Letter From Resident of Rome, Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I received today from a resident of Rome.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A GANGSTER

Roberto Rossellini: During the Fascist régime, said Rossellini has many times enjoyed the aid and protection of the Ministry of People's Culture. During the war unleashed by the Nazis, while the civilized people fought those barbarians, Rossellini went to parties, turned out Nazi propaganda films; and while the patriots were being tortured by the Nazi beasts, Rossellini enjoyed their protection.

After the liberation Rossellini sought to smother the scandal by directing two films: Rome, the Open City and Paisan. These two works are justly recognized, but [the effort] to hide his sad past has been unsuccessful.

Roberto Rossellini found shelter in an official asylum [for the criminally insane] in Italy in whose wards are sheltered only those who must give account to the law.

Rossellini is like some creeping snake; he has abused the trust of a lady, Ingrid Bergmann, has destroyed a family, has taken an innocent child away from her mother. What was his purpose in doing so? The dirtiest and unmentionable purpose, with the speculation of snatching the splendid fortune of that ingenuous lady.

This man full of vices, who has collaborated with a barbarian Nazi, a drug addict, vicious, unworthy to live in a human community of honest people, must never set foot in a civilized country like America. This vermin enveloped in falsehood, this adventurer, believed to be an honest man only because he succeeded in acquiring fame and riches in the meanest of worlds.

In a following article I shall prove and document everything on the past of Roberto Rossellini, and shall prove that Senator JOHNSON in his speech in the Senate has spoken the whole truth.

I have known Rossellini from when he was 20 years old; I know his whole past; that is why I can declare that he has betrayed, betrayed everybody—a woman, friends, relatives, father, and mother. That is why I inform the American people of the misdeeds of this super gangster.

A Congressman Makes Up His Mind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Rodgers Park (Ill.) News of Thursday, September 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FIRST COLUMN
(By Leo A. Lerner)

A CONGRESSMAN MAKES UP HIS MIND

"The wicked spring up like grass * * * but the righteous shall flourish as the palm tree. * * * Growing mighty as a cedar in Lebanon." (Psalms 92.)

This is the story of one man's searching his soul.

When Congressman SIDNEY R. YATES, Democrat, Ninth District, came down with a cold recently. He was sick in bed when the House voted overwhelmingly in favor of the McCarran antisubversive bill. But YATES, a first-term Congressman who has made an excellent record and is well liked by the people in his district, had to return to Congress last week, and he knew that he would have to cast a vote on the acceptance of the Senate-House conference committee report on the McCarran bill.

It was a real dilemma.

Congressman YATES knew in his heart that the bill was not a good bill. As a lawyer he felt that it was unconstitutional, since the bill was drawn in such broad language as to make possible the intimidation and persecution of citizens who are not guilty of any real subversion. He knew that the bill would not hurt the Communists but actually help them, and that its provisions would weaken the security of our country.

YATES knew something else that was even more important, and that is that it was possible under this bill to smash the future of liberalism in America by bringing on a new series of outrages against people guilty of liberal thinking. And he knew that the end of liberal thinking usually means the end of progress itself.

YATES, a sensitive person and a student of history, remembered that at several other times in the history of our country we had passed legislation under hysterical circumstances for which later the country was sorry.

But some practical people in YATES' district, those who wanted to see him return to Congress, advised him to vote in favor of the bill. They reasoned with him like this: "Your opposition is going to try to smear you as a Communist. We all know that you are not a Communist. We know, in fact, that you have always been a good and loyal American, but if you fail to vote for the McCarran bill, you will be singled out and pushed around."

These friends continued, "Sure, we know the bill is no good, a great many of the Congressmen who are voting in favor of the bill know the bill is no good, and yet they are voting for the bill because they feel intimidated. This is an election year, and anybody who fails to follow the so-called popular sentiment is caught in that trap."

Congressman YATES searched for the answer. He asked many of his friends what to do. They were divided.

The idealists said, "You know it is a bad bill, you should not vote for it, and even if you go down to defeat, it is better to vote your own convictions, than to be wrong for political considerations."

The other half said, "You are a useful man in Congress, you are one of the leaders of the northern Democratic liberal bloc. If you vote against the McCarran bill, it might cause you to lose the election. One vote more or less won't make any difference. We think you should compromise with your conscience in order to be able to serve the country and your ideals in the long run."

Up to the very last minute before leaving for Washington last Tuesday, YATES debated the pros and cons of his vote on the McCarran bill. He knew that his Republican opposition in the Ninth Congressional District was going to try to smear him by comparing his votes on various issues with those of Congressman MARCANTONIO.

(This in spite of the fact that the Republican isolationists vote like MARCANTONIO more often than YATES ever did.)

He feared that his vote on this single issue might make a difference to people who could be misled, to people who did not read and would not read the McCarran bill, but who could be told that YATES voted in favor of communism by voting against the bill.

The Congressman spent several sleepless nights.

On the way to Washington on the plane he read a little article in a magazine called Confessions of a Candidate, by Richard L. Neuberger, who was elected to the State senate in the State of Oregon. In this article Neuberger said that the public admires an honest man who votes his convictions and principles more than it does a fence straddler and an opportunist.

But on the other hand, YATES asked himself, what can a little man like himself do when confronted with the overwhelming decision of the other Congressmen. One of YATES' friends had said to him, "After all, you are not God, you can't put yourself above everybody."

True, he wasn't God, but God is in every man, and every man is in God. God speaks to each man in His own way; each man's sober judgment is a part of the universal scheme.

YATES remembered what another good friend had told him. "Long after this vote, you will have to live with yourself. Vote the way your conscience dictates, don't vote to get votes, vote for the right, and the votes will take care of themselves."

Some time in that starry night high above his beloved America, the land of his birth and his opportunity, the land where he had done so much and given so much, SIDNEY YATES made up his mind.

He decided that he would trust the people of his district. He would stake his future on playing it square.

When the McCarran bill came up for vote on Wednesday, Congresman SIDNEY R. YATES, of the Ninth Congressional District of Illinois, stood up and voted "No" on the McCarran bill. With him were three other Illinois Congressmen, BARRATT O'HARA, ADOLPH SABATH, and WILLIAM L. DAWSON. All of these voted their convictions honestly, in favor of Americanism—the old-fashioned Americanism of Washington, Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln.

The Passing of Dr. Pugh

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from September 16 issue of the Chester Times, of Chester, Pa., in which the editor, Alfred G. Hill, pays tribute to the distinguished career of the Reverend Dr. William Barrow Pugh, one of the great spiritual leaders of our country, whose tragic death on September 14 was a great shock to the Christian world.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PASSING OF DR. PUGH

The last picture this writer has of his neighbor, William Barrow Pugh prior to his tragic death late Thursday was that of Dr. Pugh walking about his garden with his third-generation namesake, better known as "Bunkie," age 21 months.

Increasingly in recent months, "Bunkie" and Don, Jr., another grandson of almost the same age, had become a major incentive for Dr. Pugh to hurry home and devote hours to the close study of these first grandchildren.

Earlier there had been the period of delight on the part of Dr. Pugh when he had welcomed two daughters to the Pugh family, the brides of his two sons who married soon after returning from their years on World War II service. And it is needless to say that Dr. Pugh had virtually lived the budding careers of his two lawyer sons. Finally it should be observed that another field of sympathetic interest was in watching his wife plan and develop their beautiful home with its spacious surroundings.

Another revealing thing: Never did this observer see a man who found more apparent pleasure in the little gifts which came home with him, day after day, and week after week.

That may seem a strange contrast from the unsparing grind of Dr. Pugh's professional life both as a spiritual leader and administrative head of the great Presbyterian denomination.

Duty, as Dr. Pugh saw it, took him to all parts of the world. His hours of work were long. They included night work at home. They included association with persons whose names are most familiar in this country and over the world.

Through it all, Dr. Pugh was the same unassuming, forthright, clear-thinking individual as the Reverend Bill Pugh which Chester knew so well for 10 years during which period he was the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Chester.

Dr. Pugh transmitted the common touch in his unvarnished accounts of his experiences afield. How well he knew human nature, yet how completely sympathetic was he to those with whom he came into contact. There was combined in Dr. Pugh the tolerance of the diplomat and the zeal of the crusader.

Dr. Pugh did not spare himself, and the strain of the World War years and those following, had taken their toll. But the viewpoint remained cheerful and confident in the ultimate future. And Dr. Pugh continued to cherish the friendships of earlier years when he was a National Guard chaplain in World War I and even earlier when he was active in baseball and other sports.

It was difficult from this viewpoint to understand how Dr. Pugh could stand up under the exceptional strain which the combination of administrative detail, travel, and public speaking take from a man.

But never did Dr. Pugh indicate his desire for a more leisurely, less responsible routine. It would be hard to imagine Dr. Pugh living with real happiness on an inactive basis.

It is particularly hard to lose such a man at a time when his experience and wisdom are so much needed by a world which can only be saved by the Christian standards which Dr. Pugh preached and lived.

And yet it is glorious to go to another sphere at a time when an individual such as Dr. Pugh is in full fruition of his powers, and with a record such as his to live on everlastingly.—A. G. H.

Home Front Death Trap

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, last month we all were shocked over the tragedy of the railroad accident in Ohio which caused the death of some 30 American soldiers and the maiming of some 50 others. Not long after that tragedy a frank and thought-provoking editorial concerning such accidents was printed by the Orlando Morning Sentinel which is published in Orlando, Fla., by Martin Andersen, an eminently capable and public-spirited newspaperman.

I feel that this editorial is so timely and so deserving of attention that I ask that it be printed here so that it may be fully considered for any possible legislation or change in policy that may be needed to prevent recurrences of such unnecessary and tragic disasters.

HOME FRONT DEATH TRAP

So they're going to investigate the slaughter of more than 30 American soldiers and the maiming of 50 others in the splintered wreckage of an ancient troop train cut down the middle by a luxury streamliner on a straight-away track in Ohio.

Let the investigators go far enough and high enough to put the finger on officials responsible for hauling American boys off to war in rickety, 70-foot, wooden coaches which long ago earned the apt designation of "cattle cars."

Let it be shown if this is just another cruel result of a loathsome official policy of "let's not disturb the soft life of the voters, boys," while a relatively few young Americans are herded off to fight in mud and blazing sun, some of them to be maimed for life and others to die.

Why in the name of decency and American fair play aren't these boys riding in the stainless steel streamliners with their reinforced construction, their comfy air-conditioning and their crooning radios?

They'll know hell soon enough.

Let them ride off to it at least, in safety, if not in luxury.

Let them ride in modern passenger cars and if there aren't enough for them and for the business as usual, pleasure-as-usual crowd, then let the latter ride in the creaky day coaches of a bygone era which just about everybody except the railroads have grown out of.

And if that means more of those old day coaches on Florida-bound winter tourist trains, then that's what it means.

Any civilian who must travel these days has plenty of other choices for comfortable transportation—by private car, by bus or by plane, also amply luxurious.

The soldiers have no such choice. They travel in what some button-pusher orders out for them. And 80 of them traveled to injury and death in an antique railroad crate which had been automatically stopped twice by broken air hoses and was a helpless sitting duck in the fog for the crack City of St. Louis streamliner which streaked premature tragedy into many families.

Doesn't anybody know we are in a terrible war except the young men taken from their homes and sent to the hell of the battlefield?

Let your officials know that you know it.

Government as Usual During the War—Only an Independent Congress Responsible to the American People Can Change This Shameful Condition—The Final Decision Will Be Made by the American Voters November 7

OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, the following is a summary of the situation which I stated before a meeting in Northampton, Mass., with reference to the surplus-food commodities:

Recently President Truman asked the American people to tighten their belts and to accept cheerfully the sacrifices they would have to make in the days to come.

But he did not then and he has not since pledged any similar sacrifices on the part of the Federal Government.

Since June 25 it has been Government as usual in Washington. It will continue that way unless the American voters put a stop to it on November 7 by electing a Congress which can and will bring an end to the inexcusable waste of public funds and which can and will see to it that the Federal Government concentrates on the war effort and essential civilian services.

It makes no sense at all to take our young men and women from their homes and their families, their civilian jobs, their schools and their colleges and yet permit Federal departments and agencies to continue to carry on their government as usual activities.

It is sheer nonsense to take additional billions of dollars from the hard-earned and prudently-saved money of the American people and yet witness the spectacle of continued indefensible waste of hundreds of millions of those dollars for nonessential activities.

It is economic ignorance to be planning controls over the lives, the wages and salaries, the daily activities of the American people without using ordinary common sense by stopping promptly programs which have no possible relation to the war effort or essential civilian work.

But this will not be done voluntarily by the present administration. It is dedicated to the proposition that it can in the future, as in the past, deceive the American people as to any of the numerous errors it has made and that it must never, under any circumstances, admit a mistake or take any action which could be construed as such an admission.

If one thing is certain in these days of confusion, contradictions, and uncertainties in Washington, it is that the administration wants, is working for and will welcome the election of supine, puppet Congressmen pledged to the support of its entire program, whatever it is now or may become during these vitally important months ahead of all of us.

There are many instances which have been exposed throughout the entire range of governmental activities, but I want to give you one concrete current instance as a prime example of conditions prevailing in Washington.

Many of you know that back in January I urged the President and the Secretary of Agriculture to take constructive action on a bill I filed providing for the disposal of the huge stocks of surplus foods being stored at tremendous cost, with some of it in danger of spoilage.

My suggestions and pleas for action were ignored for months, with one exception, when the President told a news conference that he was filing the messages in the wastebasket.

Then on July 24 Secretary Brannan belatedly came before the House Committee on Agriculture, reversed the position he had taken on March 21, that the bill I had filed on February 2 was administratively not feasible, and he recommended practically the same bill. It passed the House unanimously on August 22.

It languished in the Senate committee with neither the President nor Secretary Brannan doing anything, although we were at war and needed every dollar we could get to speed up the war effort, until September 14 when the President wrote Senator THOMAS, chairman of the Senate committee, and used virtually every argument I had made throughout this period of several months. He pointed out the obvious fact that the Government had gigantic stocks, and he said, as I had repeatedly said, that it made no sense for the Government to store these surpluses which will surely spoil while there are people in this country and overseas who badly need the food. He wrote: "This will not be a costly program. It is no more expensive to ship dried eggs and milk, for example, than to carry them for months on end. We ought to take steps to get these surpluses where they will do some good."

On September 15 the Senate committee reported the House bill favorably and that day it was included in the must legislation before adjournment.

However, during the following 8 days, I could find no evidence whatever, although I talked with a number of Senators who would have known the facts, that either the President or Secretary Brannan lifted a finger to help in the passage of the bill. I sent a telegram to the President September 23, hours before the Senate adjourned, calling his attention to the situation and urging action. I now learn that he did nothing about that except to send the telegram to Secretary Brannan, and I will refer to that shortly.

I know and you know that the administration hoped that the about-face by Secretary Brannan and the letter of the President to Senator THOMAS would give the American public the impression that they were greatly concerned about this waste of public funds and the threat of spoilage of wholesome foods. I know and you know that they counted on the universal concern of all of us about the war in Korea and world conditions to make it almost impossible for anyone to present the facts as to the real lack of interest and the inaction on the part of the administration. Surely it is obvious that the majority leadership in the Senate could and would have brought this nonpartisan bill up for prompt action if they had received any word or request from the President on September 23.

I sent the President another telegram expressing my disappointment as to the adjournment without action, referring to the fact that at least $3,840,000 would be wasted between then and November 27 in continuing this unnecessary storage, and I said: "In the light of Secretary Brannan's testimony as to the threat of spoilage and because of his admission that, under existing law, he would have the power to dispose of any commodities threatened with spoilage, I urge that you order this action to be taken at once. Any failure by him to invoke this law to prevent spoilage will be shocking to the American people."

I have received a letter sent by Mr. Brannan which is not only not responsive but is actually a masterpiece of evasion. It is an obvious attempt to build a record which it is hoped will lull and deceive the public.

On September 15 I had written asking specifically for the exact amount of food threatened with spoilage, as Mr. Brannan had testified before the House committee on July 24. I also had requested the exact location of the storage houses. But nowhere in this letter from Secretary Brannan is there any reference to the amount of spoilage, or threatened spoilage, or to direct action taken under existing law to avoid spoilage or to the exact local locations of these food stocks.

Let me quote this letter to you:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington.

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HESELTON: Reference is made to your letter of September 1, and to your letter to the President of the same date which has been referred to us for consideration. In these communications you pointed out the need for additional legislation to provide for the distribution of perishable commodities and suggested that the matter be called to the attention of the proper parties in the Senate. I also wish to acknowledge your letter of September 15 and two telegrams of September 23 to the President, which have been referred to this Department for consideration.

The situation which you described was brought to the attention of members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by the Department. As you know, on September 14 the President wrote to the Honorable ELMER THOMAS requesting that the Senate committee report favorably on H. R. 9313 to the Senate in time for final action at the current session. This letter is included as appendix A of the Senate report on H. R. 9313, dated September 15.

The Department has always maintained that authority to pay distribution costs to receiving points within States would increase the volume of surplus foods that would be distributed to needy groups. This was included in a report on several bills that were sent to the House Committee on Agriculture on March 21, 1950. On March 30, 1950, Mr. Trigg testified before the House committee concerning changes that would be desirable in section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 and on April 27, 1950, at the request of the committee, we forwarded a proposed amended to section 416. On July 24, 25, and 26, we again appeared before the House committee on this matter.

H. R. 9313 contains most of the changes the Department had previously recommended.

We are making every effort to assist State agencies responsible for intrastate distribution of surplus foods to handle maximum possible amounts during the coming year.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

I have received the official report of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the month of July. Let me point out that this report is available to the public and the Congress nearly 2 months after the period which it covers. It does seem as though the Department of Agriculture, with 85,434 employees in July of this year, a payroll of $23,261,000, and an appropriation for this fiscal year of $773,208,924, could keep its reports much more current and could answer legitimate questions promptly by referring to the daily records of bills paid for storage of food commodities at different locations.

In any event, I find that in July the Federal Government paid for carrying charges on 17 items of food which could be eaten without processing $1,100,045.30. This is at the rate of more than $35,000 a day. In view of an estimate I received on September 12 as to the amount on hand on September 11 of 9 of these items, it is a certainty that the rate of daily expenditure for unnecessary storage is greatly increased now over July.

From July 1, 1949, to June 30, 1950, the amount of this indefensible waste was $38,700,524.29. It is dead certain that it will not be less in this fiscal year unless Congress does something about it. And that will only be by a Congress dedicated to its own responsibilities to the American people, not a subservient rubber stamp of the administration.

The tragedy is in the realization that these hard-earned and prudently saved tax dollars are gone forever and for no useful purpose. Think of what $77,000,000 would mean in terms of guns and ammunition for our fighting forces.

This is all in sharp contrast to the warning the President gave the American housewives when he said: "Every American housewife must not buy more than she needs. She must put off buying whenever she can. If the housewife insists on buying more than she needs, there will not be enough to go around and prices will go up."

Of course, hoarding is unnecessary and harmful. The President rightly said so. But the contrary is what he permits the Federal Government to do. It is not the American housewives who are hoarders. The biggest hoarder in all history is the Federal Government.

I realize that it is probably impossible to rectify this situation now with Congress recessing—over the protest of a great many Republicans and a number of Democrats—subject only to recall by the President before November 27. However, I shall continue my efforts to develop the facts and to urge action. I want to repeat my appeal to all those who may know of the locations of these stored commodities so that my colleagues and I can try to get these facts. As of July 31, there were 8,779,317 pounds of dried milk, 398,662 pounds of cheese and 668,877 pounds of butter then stored in Massachusetts.

I have written a letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture summarizing the situation and asking him to schedule hearings immediately upon the return of Congress to bring out the truth. I wrote: "If there has been no spoilage, that fact will be welcome news. If there has been spoilage by November 27, the full extent of it should be reported to your committee." I have reason to believe that the committee will inquire into the facts.

This case history of casual indifference to the situation which confronts the American people, with a sharply increased tax bill and the possibility of rigid control, is not confined to any one department or to any one agency in one department.

The investigators for the House Appropriations Committee developed two instances of such senseless actions. They found that another branch of the Department had sent one-half of a truck unit to Florida and the other half to Texas in order to prevent another branch within the Department from using it.

This particular branch asked Congress for funds for 63 new automobiles. The Appropriations Committee investigators found that this bureau's Denver office with 35 persons had 217 automobiles of which 194 were unused.

Government records show that the Bureau of Indian Affairs has 11,300 employees for 363,000 Indians—1 Government employee for every 30 Indians.

The Hoover Commission reported that the Federal Government spends $10 to buy and process each 50-cent typewriter ribbon. Yet the Post Office Department in Washington is dragging its heels under the authority given it by Congress to modernize its mangement system.

The height of overlapping, doubling of effort and waste of taxpayers' money is probably reached in the field of Government printing and propaganda. There are 61 separate printing and duplicating plants in Washington, 23 in San Francisco, 25 in Philadelphia, 16 in Chicago, 6 in Kansas City, and 16 in New York, with others scattered all over the country.

It would take the rest of the afternoon and evening to give you a complete catalogue of convincing evidence of this Government-as-usual attitude in Washington. I hope that this brief outline will be sufficient so that you and your friends will do everything in your power to see that this shall not continue. What has been tolerated for 3 months during the Korean fight will be terminated only by an intelligent and determined Congress recognizing its responsibilities to all the American people.

Happenings in Washington

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD program No. 34 in my series of broadcasts to the citizens of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON

(Program No. 34)

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital and bringing you another discussion of happenings in Washington.

Congress has now completed setting up the machinery for total mobilization of our Nation's strength to meet the threat of Communist aggression.

We have appropriated approximately $30,000,000,000 to be spent directly for national defense. Other billions have been appropriated, part of which will contribute either directly or indirectly to our defense.

We have given the President authority to draft manpower for the armed services. Under the defense production bill which Congress enacted, the President has the right to fix prices and stabilize wages. He has the power to set up a system of priorities and allocations of critical materials.

He has been given the authority to requisition plants, equipment, and materials needed for national defense. He has been given the power and authority to expand the Nation's industrial productive capacity if needed to meet military requirements.

He has been given the authority to restrict consumer credit and real-estate credit on new construction.

No President in the history of our country has ever been given such complete authority to regulate and direct the economic life of the Nation.

Under our system of government, the President has the duty of administering the laws enacted by Congress. The management of these vast expenditures and far-reaching controls is a tremendous responsibility. Congress does not share in that administrative function. The job is solely in the hands of the President and his administration. In other words, responsibility for the success or failure of the program rests with the President.

I know that the American people hope and pray that the powers that have been granted to the President will be exercised wisely; that he will surround himself with men of outstanding ability and integrity.

We must make sure that the people of the United States get a dollar's worth of defense in return for every dollar that is spent. We must make doubly sure that the defense funds are spent to provide the best and most modern weapons and equipment for our fighting men.

It is my considered opinion that Congress has failed in one respect to meet its responsibility in the present crisis.

Certainly the times call for a drastic reduction of all governmental spending not connected with national defense. In spite of the $30,000,000,000 defense program for this fiscal year, Congress yielded to administration pressure and continued to appropriate billions of dollars for domestic programs which could and should have been curtailed or eliminated. The left-wingers and pinks continued their fight for socialistic experiments that would only regiment our people and undermine our system of government.

Many of us in Congress voted for drastic reductions. Finally we were able to eliminate the expenditure of approximately one-half billion dollars out of a budget of nearly sixty billions. That was a mere "drop in the bucket."

The general appropriation bill, as passed, directed the President to trim $550,000,000 out of the total amount of thirty-six billion one hundred and fifty-three million. He was given the authority to decide where and how the economies were to be effected.

I do not approve of that method. Congress was shirking its responsibility when it "passed the buck" to the President in directing him to trim $500,000,000 out of the overall appropriation.

It was the responsibility of Congress to determine just where the cuts should be made. We should have proceeded to make those cuts.

The total budget for this fiscal year will be nearly $60,000,000,000. Even with the new tax bill, which will raise an additional $4,500,000,000, we will probably run a deficit of at least $15,000,000,000 this year alone.

Such unsound financing must not continue.

Our Republic and our individual freedom cannot survive in the shackles of overwhelming debt. It is, therefore, mandatory for us to pay as much of the cost of defense out of current revenues as is humanly possible.

The President, in his recent radio report to the people, said:

"All of us—whether we are farmers or wage earners or businessmen—must give up some of the things we would ordinarily expect to have for ourselves and our families. The danger the free world faces is so great that we cannot be satisfied with less than all-out effort by everyone."

With that statement I am in full accord. I think it applies to the bureaucrats in Washington as well as the farmer, wage earners, and businessmen. I think every department and bureau, not directly connected with the national defense, should exercise the most stringent economy.

But I have seen nothing here in Washington to indicate a willingness to economize anywhere, on anything. Despite national peril, the administration is committed to the most lavish nondefense domestic spending in its entire history. The appropriations for nondefense domestic spending are almost double what they were only 2 years ago.

It would be encouraging to the people of the United States if they could see an honest effort made to reduce the cost of government on the domestic front. There has never been a time when real economy was so important. Every dollar we spend needlessly is a dollar deposited in the bank account of Joe Stalin.

In another week the taxpayers of the United States will be called upon to pay increased income taxes. The people must make sacrifices in this form and soon will be called upon to make sacrifices in many other ways.

In the preservation of our free Republic sacrifice should be shared by every individual. The President and Members of Congress could set a fine example to the American people.

Each Member of Congress receives an annual tax-exempt allowance of $2,500. The President, by a special act passed during the Eighty-first Congress, was given a tax-exempt allowance of $50,000 a year.

If the American people are called upon to make the necessary sacrifices, then I believe that the President of the United States and every Member of Congress should favor legislation to make these tax-exempt allowances subject to income tax the same as the income of the average citizen. A few weeks ago I voted to do this very thing but the proposal was defeated.

Extravagance in Government spending and waste of public funds should never be condoned but in a time of national peril it is the height of folly to continue expenditures that would weaken the defense of our freedom.

We have reached a time when the President, the Congress, the bureaucrats in Washington, State government, county government, and local government must all cut nondefense expenditures drastically.

Each one of them has that responsibility and let me say, my fellow Pennsylvanians, that each of you, as individual citizens, shares in that responsibility. You have the duty of demanding that the President, Congress, and all levels of government eliminate all waste and all nonessential services.

That is the only way that we can build up the military forces of America to meet Communist aggression. It is the only way we can escape national bankruptcy and the loss of individual freedom which must inevitably follow.

The American people realize the great danger that confronts us. Everywhere I go I find they are ready and willing to tighten their belts. They are ready and willing to make any sacrifice to preserve the American way of life.

They realize that the recent tax increase is only the beginning. They know that they will be called upon to shoulder heavier tax burdens and to make more sacrifices before we see this crisis through.

But they are looking with great anxiety to Washington for the kind of leadership in which they can have confidence.

They want and should have a hard-hitting team, working in complete harmony. They want men of broad vision directing our plans and policies, men who have been proven in the past, so there will be faith in their ability to meet what lies ahead.

Only 5 years ago the United States had achieved military victory which placed our country at the height of its power. We had the greatest military force in the world. We had industrial production unparalleled in all history. The atom bomb was ours alone.

We had defeated our enemies on every continent and turned once more to the ways of peace. But in the field of world diplomacy we met crushing defeat. In secret conferences and through a policy of appeasement we canceled out all the gains our military leaders had achieved.

Today we find ourselves trying to restore by force the peace of the world that was lost by a blundering leadership which virtually invited aggression and then resorted to arms in a sudden reversal of policy.

The mistakes of the past that have led us into the present crisis must not be repeated.

We must remember that after Communist aggression is crushed in Korea, as assuredly it will be crushed, we cannot count it a complete victory.

The godless enemy of human liberty will still be a powerful force, ready to spring again with all the ruthless brutality that has enslaved one nation after another behind the iron curtain of tyranny.

For our own national security and for the sake of freedom and peace in the world we must maintain our strength at its highest peak.

We must never forget that Soviet Russia regards Korea as a mere testing ground and that the present conflict is only the opening round in further aggression which aims to involve the United States in one war after another against the Communist satellites.

By that process Joe Stalin hopes to sap our military and financial strength, to prepare the way for the destruction of American freedom and thus gain Communist domination over the whole world.

Let us therefore take warning from our experience in Korea. Let us determine that we will never again be caught in the same state of unpreparedness.

While the Communist menace exists in the world we must not let down or divert our preparedness to meet that challenge.

We must be ready to meet force with superior force, with patriotism, sacrifice, and the utmost in military, financial, moral, and spiritual strength.

We must go ahead with complete realization that the cost will be stupendous.

But if American strength and power can avert global war the price will be insignificant compared to the sacrifice which our fighting men are making with such heroism in the bloody slaughter of the Korean battlefields.

Here in Pennsylvania we have already felt the terrible shock of war's tragic cost. I refer to the troop-train disaster which took the lives of 33 members of the One Hundred and Ninth Field Artillery of Pennsylvania's own Twenty-eighth Division.

These fine young men will always be remembered as casualties of war who gave their lives for their country in the same patriotic spirit as their comrades who face the enemy in Korea.

Their families know the real meaning of sacrifice.

While we honor their memory let each and every one of us dedicate our lives in our country's cause and help hasten the day when peace will rule the world, under God, with freedom and justice.

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Memorial Launched for University of Michigan Students and Alumni Who Died in World War II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, on October 2, thousands of University of Michigan alumni and their friends gathered throughout the Nation to celebrate Atom Day and the launching of the University of Michigan Memorial-Phoenix project. Among the participants, who were joined together by telephonic connections from their various meeting places as well as by a Nation-wide radio broadcast, were Ambassador Warren Austin, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, and Gordon Dean, Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The University of Michigan Memorial-Phoenix project is a memorial to the Michigan students and alumni who died in World War II. It will be financed by private subscriptions. It contemplates an exploration into the field of atomic science from the point where the discovery of atomic energy and its military application leave off.

The project seeks to coordinate all the resources of academic life in the direction of obtaining maximum peacetime benefits from atomic energy.

It is apparent that peacetime uses of atomic energy will have untold effects in the fields of architecture, engineering, economics, law, sociology, and so on through the entire range of human knowledge and activity. It is the purpose of the Phoenix project to speed the adaptation in all these fields to the potentialities of atomic energy, and thus to lessen its impact and heighten its benefits to mankind.

I am tremendously enthused by this project, which will cooperate with all related governmental research and activity but which will not rely upon the Government for support. It was my good fortune to be able to participate in the Atom Day program of October 2, in Ann Arbor. I ask to have printed in the Appendix my radio remarks in introducing Ambassador Warren Austin.

There being no objection, the introduction was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The undertaking which brings us together, throughout the Nation, has a noble inspiration. Nothing could possibly be a more fitting memorial than this project which proposes to serve the living in honor of the dead.

It is a project of tremendous scope and meaning, symbolizing much for the future of humanity.

It breathes the air of the future.

It is novel not only in its sweep but in its purpose.

Every past discovery of energy sources has brought tremendous changes, confusion, and accompanying fear. By its explorations into the peacetime uses of atomic energy this project seeks to dispel the fear and helplessness that men feel in the face of the unknown.

The guiding spirit of this project is that where the light of knowledge shines the darkness of fear disappears. It is a spirit of hope and of promise.

Its significance does not stop with its scope or purpose. The means of its realization has equal significance.

This is to be a project established and maintained by private, individual subscriptions—from Michigan alumni giving not alone out of pride and gratitude to their alma mater but out of a sense of individual responsibility for the aims of the project.

In short, this project marks a resurgence of private enterprise in an era which has somehow forgotten what the spirit of private enterprise has meant in the past, to the enlightenment and advancement of mankind.

No one could more appropriately take part on this occasion than the guest I now have the distinction to present, from New York.

Warren Austin, too, is pioneering in fields which still stand in the shadows of uncertainty. But he, too, is engaged in an effort to sweep away those shadows so that men everywhere may live without fear in a new era of peace and progress.

No one who has recently been witness to the historic meetings of the United Nations could have turned away unimpressed by the firm Vermont hand which has so largely guided those sessions through their stormy ways.

It is a hand whose granite strength is drawn first from the person of the man, but also from the principles for which he stands in addressing the world.

I can be pardoned a note of pride in my introduction, for I call him my friend. I speak, however, in terms of tribute from a grateful nation.

I take great pleasure in introducing Warren Austin, United States Ambassador to the United Nations, speaking from the Hotel Biltmore in New York City.

Address of Rear Adm. Sidney W. Souers at the Graduation Exercises of the FBI National Academy

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the excellent address which was delivered by Rear Adm. Sidney W. Souers at the graduation exercises of the FBI National Academy on September 29, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Director Hoover, distinguished guests, members of the graduating class and friends of the FBI National Academy, it has been my privilege to work for nearly 20 years with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and with the other security and intelligence services of our Nation. It has been an increasing pleasure throughout this period to work with the FBI's distinguished director, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, and I am especially pleased to be able to join with him in these graduation exercises of the FBI National Academy.

Since its establishment by Mr. Hoover in 1935, the Academy—like the FBI itself—has made a major contribution to the security and welfare of the United States. The wisdom and foresight displayed in founding this school were amply proved by our magnificent security record during World War II. Thanks largely to the FBI and its National Academy there was not a single major act of enemy-inspired sabotage, and crime was held down to a remarkably low level during that entire period.

Now we are again in a period of grave international tension, for Communist imperialism endangers the peace of the world and threatens our existence as a free nation. The fears and suspicions brought on by Soviet aggression will last for many years and, as public servants, we are acutely concerned over the dangers of espionage and subversion, engendered by that foreign-inspired aggression.

Accordingly, you and your fellow law-enforcement officers face a new period when your contributions will be of major importance in protecting our country. You gentlemen who are graduating are, indeeed, to be congratulated in preparing yourselves for the difficult times ahead.

As President Truman recently stated, "We face most acutely the threat of the Communist movement, international in scope, directed from a central source, and committed to the overthrow of democratic institutions throughout the world." While Mr. Hoover, the FBI, and others concerned with national security fully recognize the gravity of the menace confronting us, I would like to emphasize this morning some aspects of this menace which warrant special attention at this time.

The false, materialistic and godless ideology known as communism advocates and strives to effect a series of violent revolutions, designed to overthrow all non-Communist governments. Its success to date are well known to all, particularly are they well known to the distressed and suffering peoples of Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Poland, Albania, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and eastern Germany, all of whom have been enslaved by the proponents of this inhuman philosophy.

Just as this enslavement process was facilitated in those countries by Kremlin-directed agents of international communism, so also are Communist agents working in our midst today to bring about similar conditions in the United States.

While there is no possibility that communism will ever have any appeal to large numbers of our people, there are many thousands of party members in this country who comprise the hard core of the American Communist movement and who have sworn allegiance to their Soviet-controlled bosses.

There is no danger that these agents can deliver us into the hands of their masters in the Kremlin, but their very existence is a grave danger to our national security. These conspirators are prepared to serve the Kremlin by committing sabotage, espionage, and subversion whenever they receive orders to do so.

It is against these hard-core Communists that we must direct our efforts. It is against them that President Truman has directed the energetic action that has brought about the prosecution and conviction of many Communist agents as well as the assortment of atomic spies recently brought to account.

To deal with these subversives, strong laws have been on the statute books for some time. The President has from time to time recommended additional internal security legislation as needed. The Congress included most of the President's recommendations in the Internal Security Act of 1950, but the Congress also incorporated therein a number of provisions which were contrary to the President's recommendations.

The President felt impelled to veto the act as passed by the Congress because it contained a number of confused and unworkable provisions. Many of these provisions are so sweeping that they may affect not only the hard-core Communists, tens of thousands of persons who, whether knowingly or not, have at one time or another been associated with questionable organizations. Although passed over his veto, the President has directed the Department of Justice to enforce impartially, judiciously, and vigorously, the provisions of this act to the best of its ability.

It is fortunate that the American people are fully aroused to the sinister evils of communism, but we must watch our step in how we deal with it. The wave of anticommunism which is sweeping the country is not an unmixed blessing. It contains the seeds of danger. Unrestrained and indiscriminate anti-Communist activity can be just as dangerous to American institutions as Communist activity itself.

The problem we have with communism is not a new problem. The issue which communism presents to us as public servants is an old one—as old as the United States itself. The issue is simply this: How, in times of stress and danger, do we maintain the order and security we want without sacrificing personal liberty?

This is a profoundly important issue, and I believe it will help our thinking on the subject if we look back to the early days of our Nation.

Our ancestors fought the war for independence because the British Government was trying to tighten its grip on the Thirteen Colonies. It wanted more order, more security, and more control over the thoughts and acts of the colonists. British taxes, British soldiers, and British royal governors made the colonists so angry they declared their independence, and fought a lonely, bitter war for 5 years. We owe our freedom to this indignation which early Americans felt against the encroachment of government powers—including police powers—on their personal freedom.

When the Revolution ended in victory, the leaders of the Thirteen Colonies were so eager to enjoy their newly won independence that they forgot all about the necessity for a central government to provide order and security. They broke apart into 13 rival, jealous States.

All of us know the story. The Confederation went bankrupt. Riots broke out. Too much liberty proved to be worse than too much security.

Colonial leaders made a new start, drafted a new Constitution, and started a new government. This time, they established a strong central government to provide the order and security they had not had since the Revolution began. But because of their unhappy experience with the British, they were still afraid of a government which might unduly limit personal liberty. They wrote out a Bill of Rights for the new Constitution to safeguard the rights of every citizen.

That Bill of Rights has been the guardian of our personal liberties ever since. The Constitution and the Bill of Rights struck the perfect balance between security on the one hand, and liberty on the other.

Unfortunately for our record as a democracy, however, there have been a few occasions when an excited public opinion has forced the Government to take drastic action completely contrary to the spirit of the Bill of Rights. In 1798, for example, many Americans were alarmed by the excesses of the French Revolution. They were afraid that French agents in this country were endangering our independence.

Under the pressure of public opinion, Congress passed the alien and sedition laws. These laws were intended to protect the country from acts inspired by a radical foreign government, but they were so loosely drawn that they were used to put many law-abiding citizens in jail.

The alien and sedition laws were so contrary to the spirit of the Bill of Rights that a strong reaction set in against them. The anti-French hysteria passed and the offending laws were repealed.

That experience teaches us that we must always be on guard against those who are willing to undermine personal freedom in the name of national security.

I have cited these historical references so that we may all have in mind the fact that, while communism in its present form is a new and serious threat, the problem it raises for us as public officials is a very old one. In our determination to keep communism under control, we must never forget that extreme action on an indiscriminate basis may be as dangerous to our liberties as anything the Communists themselves could ever do in this country. We have no place in our country for vigilante activities.

As a matter of fact, American Communists would like nothing better than a wholesale outbreak of vigilante activities so that they might capitalize on the ensuing confusion. Should such an outbreak occur, I am sure that it would serve only to make martyrs of the Communists. They would take advantage of vigilantism by initiating a compaign of vituperation against all law enforcement.

I would not for a moment underestimate the seriousness of the Communist menace. I know from personal and long experience in dealing with Communist agents how clever and dangerous they can be. But, I am convinced that we are already meeting the challenge of communism in a sober and sensible way. I am convinced that we can control the problem. I am convinced also that there is no need for the American people to give way to another wave of hysteria like those which have swept our country in the past.

My confidence is based on the soundness of the policies which the Nation is now following in dealing with communism.

We are attacking the Communist menace in three ways.

First, we are building up the strength of the free world. The greatest danger of communism comes from abroad. We hope the Communists will not start a third world war, but the invasion of the Republic of Korea demonstrates that Communist leaders are willing to use open warfare as well as internal subversion to extend their tyrannical control over other countries. Because of that danger, we are doubling the size of our Army, Navy, and Air force, and we are more than doubling our military aid to other free nations. We are building this military strength to convince the Communist leaders that they cannot afford to start another Korean episode.

Our second method of attacking communism is to continue improving our own democracy. We already have the richest, most productive economy the world has ever known, and we enjoy the world's highest standard of living. Americans own 85 percent of the world's automobiles. As a nation, we have more and better food than any other country. We have more schools and more hospitals. We have complete freedom of speech and of religious worship. But it would be foolish to pretend that we are perfect. Some poverty, slums, and misery still exist. These conditions aid the growth of communism, for Communist leaders make glittering promises to the under-privileged, who have no way of knowing that these promises are entirely false.

The best way to curb communism in the United States is to wipe out these conditions upon which it thrives by continuing to improve the health, welfare, and education of our under-privileged. If we maintain this progress in improving our democracy, communism will never have any appeal to the American people.

Our third method of attacking communism is by working, through our intelligence and law enforcement agencies, against those engaged in subversive activities. We must work calmly, without hysteria, and with the aid of a patriotic and fully-informed public.

While we have been building up our military strength and improving our democracy, we have been fully aware of the threat of Communist infiltration in this country. The Government has vigorously attacked Communists wherever and whenever their activities have been a genuine threat. The Government has carried on the fight against subversive activities with every law on the statute books.

No known instance of Communist subversion—or any other kind of subversion—has remained uninvestigated.

The Government has crippled the Politburo of the American Communist Party by prosecuting and convicting 11 of its top-ranking members.

The Government has successfully prosecuted many other persons for crimes related to communism.

The Government has also prosecuted and obtained convictions of a large number of alleged Communists on charges of contempt, for refusing to testify before congressional committees or Federal grand juries.

The Government is now investigating the cases of more than 1,000 citizens to determine whether their citizenship should be revoked on grounds involving subversive activities.

The Government has initiated deportation proceedings against numerous Communists and other subversive aliens.

The Federal employee loyalty program has protected the Government against subversive employees while, at the same time, it has fully protected the rights of each individual employee.

The Government has taken all these steps, and it will continue to act against Communist subversion, remaining always well within the framework of the Bill of Rights.

The Federal Government has been able to carry on its effective work against subversive activities, in large part because of the splendid cooperation it has received from State and local law enforcement officers.

It is obvious that subversive activities know no geographical boundary lines and that they must be dealt with on a Nation-wide basis, through the coordinated efforts of all lay-enforcement agencies. It is for that reason that President Roosevelt in 1939 designated the FBI to take charge of the Federal Government's antisubversive work. At the same time, the President requested that all State and local law-enforcement agencies cooperate and assist the FBI in this important effort.

President Truman has recently repeated this request, suggesting at the same time that all patriotic organizations and individuals report information relating to subversive activities to the FBI. The success of the FBI in keeping Communist activities at a minimum is a measure of the wholehearted cooperation and assistance which it has received in response to these requests from the White House.

Nevertheless, there is a danger that patriotic and public-spirited groups—and even some law-enforcement agencies—may forget that such matters are the responsibility of the Federal Government. The widespread public concern about communism must not result in the enactment by States or localities of unnecessary laws designed to suppress Communist activities regardless of whether or not they are subversive.

Such legislation as this would be ineffective and dangerous, and those who might sponsor it would be forgetting that such legislation is a direct infringement on the Bill of Rights. Breaking down the guaranties of the Bill of Rights in order to get at the Communists is a police-state way of doing business. If the Bill of Rights were to be broken down, all groups—even the most conservative—would be in danger from the arbitrary exercise of governmental powers.

As public servants, we are determined to protect our internal security. But in that determination we must never forget that the purpose of that security is to allow us to enjoy personal liberty.

As law-enforcement officers, you have especially great responsibilities in this regard. You must be vigilant in enforcing the laws which protect our citizens in the exercise of their constitutional rights.

All of us who are public servants must do our best to prevent mob violence, and we must cherish and guard zealously the right of all Americans to vote, to speak freely, to worship freely, and to be tried fairly.

As public officials it is our duty to protect the innocent as much as it is to catch the guilty. Justice, and fair play for the weak, or for the victims of prejudice or suspicion, are as important to our democracy as prompt punishment for the guilty.

The public interest—which all of us are sworn to uphold—is not just the interest of our Nation, our State, or our community. It is first and foremost the interest of individual citizens.

It is this concern for the rights and the welfare of each American that distinguishes our democracy from Communist and other totalitarian states. It is this concern for the individual, as well as for our security, which must guide all law-enforcement officers in the United States. And it is this devotion to the rights of our citizens that will insure the ultimate triumph of democracy over communism.

As J. Edgar Hoover has said so well: "Law enforcement in America is inextricably linked with the democratic tradition which has given birth, guidance, and validity to the institutions of this Nation. Previous attacks on western society have been turned back. The challenge of communism, too, can and will be mastered, and in a democratic manner."

Broadcast by Alan Courtney

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, recently a Florida radio commentator, Mr. Alan Courtney, broadcast over a Miami station a statement which had originally appeared in the New York Times on August 10, 1950. As the article concisely and effectively stated the crucial situation of the Korean war, I would like to have it reproduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It follows:

The people of the United States, looking on at this war that has begun in Korea, appear to view it with about equal parts of fury, incredulity, confusion, and frustration. It's a war we don't want and have tried in every way to avoid. Two World Wars would seem to be enough. Now we have a third.

But we do have it, and unless we win it we shall lose it—and if we lose it the earth including the United States, will be governed from Moscow. The worst thing we can do at this moment is to take it for granted that we shall win. We can win only if we use our heads and hold nothing back, for the Russians have the jump on us. They are so confident that they hope not to have to fight us at all, but to run us ragged with minor engagements fought by stooges all around their periphery till we are worn out and can put up only guerrilla resistance when taken over.

Part of our confusion and frustration are cause by the fact that we have never been in a war like this one. This is not the first time our forces have been mauled at the beginning, but it is the first time when our enemies looked forward with confidence to the long pull. If we let it go that way, this war may last the rest of our lives, even the lives of those who are young. Russia counts on growing constantly stronger during the next 30 years. If we are harried by minor campaigns all over the world our economy and our morale are going to be subjected to such strains as they have never known. We shall have to put on stringent controls and we are going to have to do without a lot of the things we've been used to if we're to produce the quantities of munitions and train the numbers of men needed for the almost predictable series of emergencies.

The action in Korea shows us what would happen to us in the Pacific if Russia were to send her own forces against us. We could not hold Korea, we could not hold Japan, we could not hold the Philippines, we probably could not hold Alaska, and perhaps not Hawaii. A recent discussion in the House of Commons exposed very frankly what would happen to Europe if Russia decided to march west. Eighty Russian divisions and 4,000 or 5,000 tanks are mobilized and ready. Nothing could stop them before they reached the English Channel. There is only one reason why Russia has not already annexed our Pacific holdings and western Europe. She is afraid that if she makes open war on us we will drop atomic bombs. And we probably would. The world has no other reply to the enormous military machine Russia is holding over our heads.

There are many honest men who are wondering whether anything we could win by a war would be worth the immense and prolonged sacrifices a war will certainly demand of us. But one steady look at the Politburo makes it obvious to any American that he could not endure existence in that vast concentration camp which is Russia and her satellites. We know democracy is not perfect; it's only a political system which tries to give all its citizens a fair chance under rules of fair play. It's not perfect, but it's the best men have had so far and the Communist slave state is probably the worst. There are conditions under which life is not worth living, and those are the exact conditions now offered by Russia to the rest of the earth. Living in a democracy we are prejudiced against violence and try to avoid trouble when we can, but the men of violence are marching their slaves against us again. We cannot accept what they offer. Weary of war though we are, it's better to fight.

Ultimately we shall win. The atom bomb is still ours and is holding the Russians at their borders. Invention and thought, which are dead in Russia, are very much alive among us, and they will begin to find ways to defeat the massed power of slaves and steel. Every soldier in our armies is a potential leader, every working brain is a potential leader of thought. We shall fight our way out of this trap no matter how long it takes.

But from now on let us make no mistake about it—the war is on, the chips are down. Those among us who defend Russia or communism are enemies of freedom and traitors to the United Nations and the United States. American soldiers are dying in a battle against slavery, against Russia's attempt to enslave mankind. Every man's house will be in a target area before this thing ends whether we like it or not. The United Nations is on our side because Russia is at war with every nation that insists on being free. Fortunately President Truman has seen the Russian danger, and he knows as well as Churchill how boldly and rapidly we must act if we as a nation are to come out of this conflict alive. He will make very heavy demands on us, and very soon. He will have to make them, and we shall have to give everything we have to defend our liberty. Well, let us give it, and let us give ourselves, till Russia, too, has been taught that our free world is more than a match for the world of Genghis Khan.

American Legion National Executive Committee Cites Legionnaire Drew Pearson for His Services

OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpt from the Drew Pearson broadcast of Sunday, October 8, at which time Mr. Pearson received a citation authorized by the national executive committee of the American Legion and presented by George N. Craig, national commander of the American Legion:

Commander CRAIG. I am delighted to be here and also to welcome fellow Legionnaire Drew Pearson. I only wish all of the folks listening could join us in Los Angeles. To you, Drew, I want to say that millions of Americans have come to admire your achievements as reporter and interpreter of the news, but the great work you have done through people-to-people relations—to make democracy live—is perhaps not so well known.

Last Christmas the American Legion tried a new pitch in that field. We asked boys and girls all over the country each to give one of their own Christmas toys for other children born in lands where Santa Claus is a casualty of war. That was the Tide of Toys—and the good people of the United States, young and old, responded so well that we were able to send 3,000,000 toys to a dozen different countries.

That program never would have started—much less succeeded—without the support and hard work of a man by the name of Drew Pearson. How we feel about your part in the Tide of Toys, Drew, is pretty well summed as in a citation authorized by our national executive committee. I know that Americans everywhere will share with me the privilege of presenting it to you at this time.

It reads as follows:

"In recognition of his bold and diligent efforts since the close of the Second World War to promote reciprocal understanding and good will between the people of the United States and those of western Europe;

"As manifested in particular by the sponsorship and delivery to France and Italy of the Friendship Train of food and clothing which contributed materially to a recession of Communist strength in those countries;

"And more recently by his extraordinary cooperation with the American Legion in the planning and execution of the Tide of Toys;

"The national executive committee of the American Legion commends the Honorable Drew Pearson on behalf of 4,000,000 Legionnaires and auxiliary members consecrated by common sacrifice in war and perpetual service in peace."

Happenings in Washington

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD program No. 35 in the series of broadcasts which I have been making to the citizens of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON
(Program No. 35)

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital, and bringing you the thirty-fifth in the present series of discussions of happenings in Washington.

Now that the Eighty-first Congress has recessed until November 27, we have an opportunity to examine the record it established in its second session.

We can judge its accomplishments in the light of legislation that was enacted and also on the basis of administration proposals that were rejected.

First it should be remembered that the Eighty-first Congress is under Democratic control with substantial Democratic majorities in both Houses.

Under those circumstances it would be natural to expect that the program advanced by President Truman would have easy sailing.

Yet, on many domestic proposals which would transform the Federal Government into an all-powerful, centralized, socialistic state the administration ran into a blunt "No" from Congress.

It is fortunate for the future of our country that this Democratic Eighty-first Congress said "No" to the President just as decisively as did the Republican Eightieth Congress which preceded it.

In spite of the opposition to President Truman's domestic program there was almost unanimous support for every move planned for the national defense.

The Republicans in Congress joined with the Democrats in putting through every bill designed to strengthen our national defense and to build a barrier against the further spread of communism in western Europe and Asia.

In fact, a majority of the Members of the Eighty-first Congress was ahead of the President in recognizing the dangerous threat of Communist aggression. They appropriated funds and directed the President to establish a 58-group air force. But the President ordered it cut down to 42.

They appropriated millions of dollars to support the Nationalist Government in China and more millions for arms and equipment for the defense of the free Republic of South Korea. But millions of dollars, appropriated for these purposes, were deliberately withheld by order of the President and today we are paying a terrific price for these blundering violations of the will of Congress.

More than $30,0000,000,000 was appropriated for defense purposes for this fiscal year alone.

A defense production bill was enacted giving the President complete power to mobilize and control the Nation's economy during the war emergency.

Laws were enacted authorizing the unlimited expansion of the Military Establishment.

Billions of dollars were appropriated to rearm the friendly nations of western Europe and to strengthen their economic security.

Legislation was enacted, over the President's veto, to erect safeguards against the subversive activities of Communists within our own country.

Many other measures dealing with defense and internal security were passed by Congress on a nonpartisan, nonpolitical basis.

Now let us look at the domestic program recommended by President Truman.

In his campaign speeches the President told the people over and over again that if he were given a Democratic Congress the first order of business would be the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

Then would follow his program for socialized medicine, the Brannan plan for socializing agriculture, and Federal aid to education.

In his message to Congress at the opening of the second session in January President Truman again recommended that program.

This Congress, as I have pointed out, is strongly Democratic. No matter what the Republicans wanted to do, the Democrats had the votes to jam through the entire Truman Fair Deal program.

But Congress would not accept these seemingly attractive, but unsound proposals because they would sweep the country closer and closer toward the rocks of socialism. Yes; toward that all powerful, bureaucratic form of government which is the very essence of state socialism. They are the direct opposite of the American system which elevates the dignity and the freedom of the individual rather than the supremacy of the state.

This was accomplished by the determined opposition of the Republican minority aided by sound Democrats who placed real Americanism above party lines.

Let us consider briefly the proposals which Congress refused to approve.

You remember, of course, that when the Eightieth Congress passed the Taft-Hartley law over Harry Truman's veto, it was denounced by administration spokesmen and some labor leaders as a "slave labor" law.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, this law has been in operation for 3 years and has been invoked by the President himself to meet emergencies which he could not handle otherwise.

Do you see American labor in shackles? Is there a single workingman in the entire country who is oppressed or enslaved by the Taft-Hartley law?

Has the right of labor to organize, to bargain collectively or to strike been taken away?

You know the answer. It is perfectly obvious in the higher wage scales that have been gained by organized labor since the Taft-Hartley law was passed and the new round of wage increases now under way.

Labor organizations today are stronger and richer than ever before and the individual member has greater freedom. The Taft-Hartley law is such a fair law that even this Democratic Congress refused to repeal it.

Let us turn now to some of the purely socialistic proposals—those which pretend to give to the people something for nothing.

Congress refused to approve socialized medicine for the American people. Under that scheme the Government would provide so-called free medical and dental care for all the people. The Government would pay the bill.

At first glance many people would wonder why anyone would oppose such a plan. But most Members of Congress and nearly all of the Nation's doctors and dentists were against it as well as millions of other Americans.

Why was there such strong opposition?

Well, of course the Government would tax the people to get the money to pay the doctors. So it wouldn't be free after all. And it would take an enormous army of payrollers to do the paperwork and keep the books and you would be taxed for that too.

The Government would have complete control over the medical and dental profession. They would all be working for the Government, wasting most of their time in the jungle of bureaucratic red tape.

The free choice of doctors and the personal relationship between physician and patient would be destroyed. The standards of medical practice would be lowered, just as they have been in England.

Next is the Brannan farm plan which this Congress could not stomach. It is a shrewd, insidious thing. It promises guaranteed high prices to the farmer, and at the same time, lower food prices to the consumers. That too sounds like utopia. Do you wonder why Congress said "No" to that?

Let me tell you why.

Under this system, Secretary of Agriculture Brannan admits, the farmer would usually get more for his product than the consumer paid for it. Who would pay the difference? The taxpayer, of course.

The consumer would pay the price of the food on the open market, plus the taxes necessary to cover the difference. But that's not all—the consumer would also be taxed to pay another army of snoopers, inspectors and bookkeepers to administer the program.

How much would this scheme cost? No one—not even Mr. Brannan—has the faintest idea. But the most objectionable feature is that the farmer would be completely robbed of his independence. He would be placed under the most rigid governmental controls and regulation.

In effect, an iron collar would be placed around his neck with a chain reaching to Washington. He would be told what to plant and how much. He, too, like the doctor under socialized medicine, would have to spend much of his time keeping records demanded by Government red tape.

Although Congress rejected this scheme, the administration has not abandoned it. It has never ceased selling the idea to our people as an easy way for the farmer to get higher prices and the consumer to pay less. It is pure socialism, contrary to the traditional freedom of the American farmer.

Federal aid to education is another proposal which seems to be desirable on its face. But that, too, was rejected by Congress because it would eventually give the Federal Government dictatorial power over educational policies which rightfully belong under local control.

Such power in the hands of an unscrupulous administration could be used to regiment the thinking of the youth of America, just as Hitler did in Germany and Stalin is doing today in Soviet Russia.

And again, the people would be taxed to pay for a program which in a few years would cost several billion dollars annually.

There are other proposals in this Fair Deal program.

But I want you to notice that everything in this category has three elements in common.

First, the Government promises something attractive to the people—free.

Second, to get it free, the people must pay heavier taxes.

Third, the Government would step in and clamp new controls over the freedom of the individual and how he earns his livelihood.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, beware of governments that come bearing gifts like that. There is danger ahead when the Government offers something for nothing.

Congress has beaten down a number of these propositions—but it is not the end. The people and Congress must be vigilant that the administration does not place these programs into effect by presenting them as defense measures.

Once the yoke is placed upon our necks it will be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to remove it.

On the credit side it is worthy of mention that a majority of the Republicans and Democrats alike supported legislation to increase social-security benefits and to expand its coverage, to liberalize the admission of displaced persons, and to raise the minimum wage. These were pledged by both political parties.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, let me offer a word of warning. With a Korean victory our people may be inclined to relax. Some may say we ought to water down our rearmament program and coast awhile.

I do hope you will not be misled by such easy, soft thinking. Korea is a tiny corner of the globe. Bloody as it is, what has happened there is not the main event.

Communist Russia has not been weakened. The fire of Russia's ambition for world conquest has not been quenched.

We are rearming ourselves, not against the Koreans, but to defend ourselves against Communist Russia and its satellites. We must not relax. We must prepare to defend freedom against any attack from the Godless forces which seek to enslave the world.

This broadcast brings to a conclusion the present series of my reports to the people of Pennsylvania on happenings in Washington.

At this time I wish to express my deep and sincere appreciation of the many helpful and encouraging letters I have received from all parts of the Commonwealth. Your comments and suggestions have been extremely valuable.

I hope you will continue to write to me. I particularly welcome any criticism or suggestions that will assist in making these broadcasts more interesting or of greater service to the people of Pennsylvania.

I extend my thanks also to the radio stations which have so generously made their facilities available to bring you these reports on the activities of Congress.

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I hope to be with you again when Congress returns to Washington.

Thank you again for your attention.

"We Wisconsin Farmers Are Voting Republican—We Know That the Republican Party Has Supported the Wisconsin Dairyman—We're With You, Senator Wiley, in Your Fight for the Dairyman—We're Going To Reelect You Because We Know You Are the Farmer's Friend"

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

During the last month, it has been my pleasure and privilege to visit practically all over wonderful Wisconsin. I have spoken to folks in the cities and in the country, at the street corners and out on the rural routes.

I have visited with farmers working in the fields and meadows and with merchants in the stores. I have talked over the problems which you, the people of Wisconsin face—problems of high prices, the problem of Korea, the problem of communism. I have asked you, the people, your reactions to the 1950 Wisconsin senatorial campaign.

I am tremendously grateful for the magnificent response which has come to me from all over our State as regards my personal campaign for reelection. Wherever I have gone, I have met grand folks who have pledged their complete support to me. They've said, in effect:

WHAT WISCONSIN FARMERS HAVE SAID

"We're with you, Senator WILEY, in your campaign for reelection. We know that you have fought the dairyman's fight in the United States Senate. We know that you have been on the job in Washington working for us, the people back home, 7 days a week, 52 weeks a year. We know that you have been working night and day for our cause, that you have the experience and the know-how to help us in the Senate.

"We know that you are a farmer yourself; that for over 34 years you have owned and operated a dairy farm in Barron County, Wis.

"We know that you appreciate the importance of farm cooperatives because your own farm receives its electricity from an REA cooperative and sells its milk to a dairy cooperative.

"We know that it was your bill—the Wiley probutter bill—which was our foremost weapon against the vicious oleomargarine lobby. We know that it was your bill—the Wiley bill—which was the spearhead of the St. Lawrence seaway fight. We know that bills introduced by our Senator WILEY have always been for the best interest of the family farmer.

"So we're with you and we're urging our friends to be with you in this campaign. We're telling them to be sure to vote on Tuesday, November 7, for Senator ALEX WILEY and for the rest of the fine Republican ticket headed by Walter Kohler, Jr., for governor."

Yes, these are the reactions of the farmers whom I have met and of folks in the cities, too. Many folks have said to me: "Senator, we may not agree with you 100 percent of the time. As a matter of fact, it is difficult for any two people to agree all of the time. But by and large we have agreed with you practically all of the time. By and large we know that you are in the right.

"We know that you are trying to do an honest, conscientious job for all the people and that it is what counts. You're a family man yourself. You've got four children and eight grandchildren. You want to keep America American and so do we."

Mr. President, these are the real sentiments which I have found in Wisconsin. I am not exaggerating them because I want to give an honest report of the convictions of these honest folks.

SENATOR WILEY'S FARM PROGRAM

As I visited these Wisconsin areas, I stated my program for Wisconsin farmers, and here it is:

1. St. Lawrence seaway: I will continue the fight (which I have waged ever since I came to the Senate) for enactment of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway bill.

2. Dairy income: I will continue the fight to assure an adequate income for our 175,000 Badger farmers, for their milk, butter, cheese, for their milk solids and ice cream.

3. Natural foods: I will do everything that is within my power to help increase consumption of body-building natural foods like milk, butter, and cheese rather than allow the synthetic lobby—the cottonseed and peanut-oil groups—to ruin the great dairy industry of America.

4. Cooperatives: I will battle against any effort made in the United States Congress to harm the great cooperative movement. I will fight for continued rural electrification, for adequate rural telephone funds, and for all other procooperative bills.

5. Taxes: I will try to ease the tax load on our citizens insofar as that can be done. In order to do so, I will seek to cut down on Federal waste and extravagance.

6. Health: I will do everything I can to help improve health standards in rural areas. This means more hospitals, more doctors, more health services for the farmer, for his wife and for his youngsters.

7. Education: I will do everything I can to help improve educational facilities in the rural areas.

8. Housing: I will seek to perfect the housing laws now on the statute books under which the farmer receives aid in the repair of his home and in construction of new farm buildings.

9. Preparedness: I will continue to strive for a well-armed, well-prepared America rather than have us helpless and defenseless as we were prior to the Korean attack. To be prepared at home means that we must have a strong, prosperous agriculture.

The farmers of Wisconsin know from my record that these planks in my platform are based not just on what I propose to do, but on what I have been doing ever since I came to Washington. In other words, the Democratic candidates have been making empty promises and never fulfilling them, whereas we Republicans have sought to actually help the farmer—by deeds, not mere words. Actions talk louder than a million words.

Let us recall these facts:

HOW REPUBLICANS HAVE HELPED FARMERS

It was Republican Congresses and Republican administrations which were responsible for—

The United States Department of Agriculture.
The United States Reclamation Bureau.
The United States Forest Service.
The Pure Food and Drug Act.
Federal regulation of oleomargarine.
Conservation of mineral resources.
Pro-cooperative legislation.
The agriculture credit law.
Establishment of the United States Dairy Bureau in the Department of Agriculture.
The Federal Farm Board to help sell farm commodities.

These are the facts of history. This is what the Republican Party has done in the past.

HOW DEMOCRATS STABBED FARMER IN BACK

On the other hand, what have the Democrats done for the farmer except hurt him? What have they done but stab him in the back?

Let us note these facts:

1. It was a Democratic President, a Democratic administration, and a Democratic Department of Agriculture which is responsible for the vicious new oleomargarine law. For 2½ weeks in January 1950 I battled against this law. But at last, after this bitter battle, the crucial Wiley probutter amendment was unfortunately defeated by the Democratic forces by a vote of 47 to 38.

2. It is a Democratic Congress and Democratic committee chairman from the South who are primarily responsible for the defeat of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway bill. This bill, if enacted, would tremendously help improve transportation of farm commodities, make transportation cheaper, easier, and faster.

3. It is a Democratic administration which has tried to lower farm supports. Republican Congressman REID MURRAY of Wisconsin and I have been battling to maintain adequate parity support, particularly for manufactured dairy products. But we have had to fight against the Democratic Secretary of Agriculture every inch of the way in order to help protect our dairymen. Note that point, my friends, against the Democratic Secretary of Agriculture.

RUINOUS STRIKES HAVE INCREASED

4. It is the Democratic Party which has been coddling the labor bosses in the big cities. The Democrats have been prodding and encouraging them to call needless strike after strike. What is the result? The result is that we farmers have had to pay constantly higher prices for the things we buy.

The result is, too, that the workers in the cities have lost countless paychecks through unnecessary strikes and that has cut down on purchasing power for farm goods. Don't forget those strikes, my friends—the railroad strikes, the coal strikes, the phone strikes, the steel strikes, the tractor strikes which paralyzed America, yes, the strikes in production of commercial fertilizer.

5. It is the Democrats, too, who have been coddling the Communists and Socialists for so many years. Every time you pick up a newspaper you see how friends of the Democrats in high office have been exposed as Red traitors.

How can the farmers vote for the Democratic Party which has shown that it is completely soft on the issue of communism? How can the farmers vote for a party which battled against the strong anti-Communist law which we just enacted over the President's veto? Farmers want to keep America American. They won't vote for a party that has coddled traitors.

6. It is the Democrats who have tried to cut the throats of farmers here at home by failing to protect the home market. Just look, for example, at the Wisconsin fur-farming industry. It has been practically bankrupted by the flood of incoming Russian furs. Just a few weeks ago I introduced the Wiley amendment to prevent this dumping of Russian furs on the market.

What happened? The Democrats as usual killed this proposal. Why? Because apparently they prefer the Russian fur farmer to make money while the American fur farmer starves. How then can Wisconsin farmers vote for a party which wants to sacrifice domestic producers for these foreign competitors? How can farmers vote for a party which encourages sales to a country which is helping Korean Reds kill our own boys?

These and other facts prove the point that I am making. The Republican Party is the friend of the Wisconsin farmer and always has been and always will be. But the Democratic Party, on the other hand, has proven itself to be the enemy of the Wisconsin farmer.

HOW DEMOCRATS BROKE THEIR PROMISE TO FARMERS

You will remember that in 1948 the Democrats promised to maintain farm income high. So many farmers unfortunately voted for the Democratic Party.

Well, what happened? As soon as the Democrats were elected to office, as soon as President Truman came into power once again, instead of being stabilized, farm income started to nosedive downward. The price of milk, butter, and cheese skidded. Wisconsin farmers lost tremendous income. Why? Because the Democrats broke their promise as usual. They completely violated their pledge.

The Wisconsin farmer will not forget this betrayal. He will not soon forget that the Democratic Party permitted the cutting of his income, that the Democratic Party passed the vicious oleomargarine law, that the Democratic Party has fought against the St. Lawrence seaway bill.

IT IS TO FARMERS' SELF-INTEREST TO VOTE REPUBLICAN

I know, therefore, that as Tuesday, November 7, approaches, our Wisconsin farmers will remember these facts. Why? Because it is to their own self-interest to do so. I know that I can count on Wisconsin farmers to go to the polls and vote Republican. They have loyally supported me in 1938 and 1944.

They know that they need a man of experience in Washington rather than a complete novice and amateur, who doesn't know his way in the complex affairs of our Nation's Capital. They know that on the farm, as well as in Washington, men of experience are desperately needed, especially in times of crisis.

Let me show you a typical wonderful letter which I've just received from a Badger farm group:

GENESEE DEPOT,
PURE MILK PRODUCTS LOCAL,
Burlington, Wis., September 13, 1950.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Chippewa Falls, Wis.

DEAR SENATOR: We, as part of the great dairy industry, wish to thank you for your untiring efforts in our behalf.

We wish to point out to the entire State of Wisconsin that you represented every one of us. Every person in our State shares directly in the milk check the dairyman receives.

Senator WILEY, you have represented us well and we look forward to a continuance of this effort on behalf of our State, in the United States Senate for the next 6 years.

By unanimous vote the secretary was instructed to send this letter expressing our feelings to you.

Yours very truly,

GEORGE F. HAAS,
Secretary.

WISCONSIN'S PRESS ENDORSES SENATOR WILEY

That is but one of countless other gracious letters which I've received.

Now, what does Wisconsin's press think about my efforts for our farm people? Well, let's take a look. Here are a few quotations from Badger papers. They are tremendously heart-warming quotations. Now, folks, I'm not taking any bows. I'm not asking for any pats on the back. But I am sincerely appreciative of these warm, sincere comments in Wisconsin's press—both daily and weekly papers. Here are but a few:

"ALEX WILEY talks the farmers' language, because he knows farm problems from first hand. He fought the farmers' battles for manpower during the war when the farms were being stripped of all hands; he fought to assure foreign markets for farm produce. He fought against OPA rules that were damaging to the Wisconsin cheese industry."—Baldwin (Wis.) Bulletin.

"Senator WILEY—the man who works for his constituents, well known for making the interests of his constituents his first consideration, be it widows, orphans, farmers, small-business men, or veterans—he can be relied upon to do the things asked of him."—Palmyra (Wis.) Enterprise.

"Senator WILEY has proved his worth in the Senate. He serves Wisconsin well. More important, he serves the Nation as a leader in our National Legislature. He should be returned to the Senate."—Janesville (Wis.) Gazette.

"There is probably not a single home in the county that has not heard of the efforts this outstanding Senator has put forth to help the dairy farmers of Wisconsin. He had been a lawyer, businessman, and farmer, having successfully operated a dairy farm for some 30 years * * * in times of crisis we need men of experience in public office, not novices who would take years to find out what government is all about."—Shawano (Wis.) County Journal.

"He works hard. He personally reported out 205 bills last session—more than any other man in the House or Senate."—Washington, D. C., Times-Herald.

"It is well that Senator WILEY has so faithfully discharged the duties of his constituents and his country. Would that we had more people so diligently devoted to our way of life."—Brillion (Wis.) News.

"The necessity of returning Senator WILEY to Washington is as obvious as anything could be. Wisconsin and the Nation need WILEY in the position of leadership to which he has risen.

"The socialistic ventures of Government must be met with men of WILEY's rank and stature in Washington."—La Crosse (Wis.) Tribune.

"Senator ALEXANDER WILEY deserves to be congratulated on his alertness in protecting and advancing the interests of Wisconsin in Washington."—Clintonville (Wis.) Tribune-Gazette.

"We need men in Congress who will fight for dairying, and for that reason we need to send ALEXANDER WILEY back to Washington."—Hillsboro (Wis.) Sentry-Enterprise.

MY HEART AND SOUL ARE IN THIS JOB FOR YOU

These papers know that my heart and soul are in this job—for you our people.

They know that I have been battling against crime, that I have been battling for world peace; that I have been fighting against communism; that I have been seeking to maintain American prosperity rather than to allow us to fall into a depression.

But let the facts speak for themselves. Let Wisconsin farm organizations and farm newspapers tell the story far better than I can.

WHAT FARMERS HAVE WRITTEN ON BEHALF OF THEIR SENATOR

Here, then, are some other quotations from a few of the hundreds and thousands of messages from individual farmers, REA cooperatives, and newspapers that have come to me endorsing my reelection. I say to all of these folks: Thanks a million, friends. I am grateful, deeply grateful to you all.

From a co-op leader in Shawano, Wis.:

"I have just read your open letter to your friends in the cooperative movement and I wish to state that I hope they all read it.

"I am sure that we people in this organization have felt that you have been an outstanding supporter of cooperative legislation and an outstanding friend of all the dairy farmers of Wisconsin."

From an individual farmer on a rural route outside Ashland:

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I am a farmer, have been all my life. * * * We think you are doing a good job at Washington. You did the best you could to keep the oleo tax from being repealed and so did our Congressman, but the CIO was too much for farmers to overcome. Wisconsin farmers will feel the blow."

From a farmer on a rural route outside Seymour, Wis.:

"We are a member of the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture. And I have followed the daily papers and radio and no one could have done better in the oleo fight than you did and you sure never gave up, and when you return home you can face the people anywhere."

From a cheese marketing leader in Monroe, Wis.:

"I know you can help us as you have done so in the past. You spoke of the Senate passing the oleo bill, which I know was no fault of yours, as you did your part very well, but I think we as producers have neglected to do our part.

"But I hope that you will not be discouraged but will keep up the good work and when election time comes will do all that we can to see that you will continue to be our Senator from Wisconsin."

From a farmers' union official in northern Wisconsin:

"MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: In behalf of the Douglas County Farmers Union I want to thank you for supporting the FHA appropriations and for having our recent correspondence entered into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

From an electric co-op official in Menomonie:

"I am sure you will do all you can to help us as you have always indicated that you are a strong supporter of the REA program.

"Thanks for copy of your statements headed 'WILEY Blasts Democrat Party Betrayal of Wisconsin Farmers.' Let me commend you for your fearless stand and your fine support of the cooperatives."

From a farmer and his wife in Jefferson, Wis.:

"My husband and I both would like to thank you for what you did to fight the oleomargarine bill. The farmer would be lost without someone to help us out like you did. After all, we have to sell our milk and butter or else we won't be able to live very long."

From a leader of a co-op creamery in Cumberland, Wis.:

"I've intended writing you for some time telling you that we appreciate the work you did in the fight against repeal of the yellow oleo law. Although we lost out and the repeal will be a black eye to the Middle West dairy States, you did your part."

CONCLUSION

Well, folks, thanks for your kind attention to this report.

Thanks, too, for your loyal help.

Please don't forget to go to the polls on Tuesday, November 7. Rain or shine, please exercise your great right to vote. Urge your friends and neighbors to do so also.

I earnestly urge you to vote for your country, to vote for your own self-interests.

Yes; vote Republican.

Vote for your senior Senator ALEXANDER WILEY. I urge that in all humility, in all modesty, in all gratitude.

Help me continue my fight in your behalf. My fight against communism, against crime, against corruption, against depression, against war; my fight for the dairy industry, for the St. Lawrence seaway, for peace, for prosperity, for freedom.

Vote for American-thinking Americans, not for Socialists, not for puppets of a few labor big shots who want to push our people around.

Vote for the Republican Party—the friend of freedom, the friend of the farmer, the wage earner, the man in the street.

Vote for the Republican Party which expanded the rural-electrification program in the Eightieth Congress to a greater extent than ever before in American history.

Vote for the Republican Party which was responsible for the first pro-cooperative legislation in our history.

Vote against the smear boys, the hate boys, the alien-minded radicals who want to sabotage this country from within.

Vote Republican.

Thanks to you folks from the bottom of my heart.

Legislative Record of the Second Session, Eighty-first Congress

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on the legislative record of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE RECORD OF THE SECOND SESSION, EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

The record of the Eighty-first Congress proves again there is a tremendous difference between a Congress with Democratic leadership and a Congress controlled by reactionary Republicans. The Republican leaders of the Eightieth Congress paid little attention to the needs of the American people.

In this Democratic Eighty-first Congress, the people came first.

The people asked for more homes—and the Congress passed a housing bill which set off the greatest building boom in American history.

The people asked for more social security—and the Congress added approximately 10,000,000 Americans to the social-security rolls and doubled the benefits.

The people asked for higher minimum wages—and the Congress lifted the wage floor from 40 to 75 cents an hour.

The people asked for rent control—and the Congress extended rent ceilings on a basis fair to tenants and landlords.

The people asked for the removal of the discriminatory provisions of our displaced persons law—and we liberalized that law.

The people asked for more trade with other countries around the earth—and the Congress restored the reciprocal trade program to the wise policy originally established by Cordell Hull and Franklin Roosevelt.

The people asked for improvements in our farm program—and the Congress passed a bill which gives us a more flexible system of farm price supports. Reversing the policy of the Eightieth Congress, which had caused many farmers to suffer losses on their surplus crops because no storage bins were available, this Democratic Congress gave the Secretary of Agriculture the necessary funds to build more bins for our huge crops.

The people sought Federal aid to education, and the Senate passed a good bill, but it bogged down in a tragic controversy in the House of Representatives.

The people asked for action to stop the Communists at home and abroad, and the Congress acted by supporting the Federal loyalty program, and tightening all laws against spies and saboteurs.

More funds than ever before were appropriated for the FBI, and J. Edgar Hoover was given authority to hire thousands of new agents to continue his splendid work in protecting America from subversive groups.

There was enacted stringent and far-reaching legislation to control Communists and other subversive persons, requiring Communists to register and authorizing their detention in case of war, invasion, or insurrection.

In foreign affairs, the Congress continued the bipartisan foreign policy with the cooperation of Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG and other Republicans who agreed politics should not determine America's course in dealing with other nations at a time when the world faced a great crisis.

After the North Korean Communists invaded South Korea in one of the most savage, unprovoked attacks in the history of the world, the Congress strongly supported the action of President Truman when, at the call of the United Nations, he ordered American forces to Korea to aid in resisting the aggressors.

The Senate ratified the Atlantic Pact, linking America in a firm alliance with 11 other free nations.

The Senate approved the International Wheat Agreement to open guaranteed markets around the globe for many millions of bushels of American grain.

The Marshall plan was extended on the scale necessary for the continued economic recovery of our friends in western Europe.

The military-assistance program for the free nations was expanded to give the people in those countries the weapons they needed to defend themselves against the aggressive Communists.

In all these great achievements in foreign policy, the Democratic leaders were able to overcome the strenuous opposition of some Republican isolationists who wanted America to turn back from the path of world leadership, to reenter the turtle-shell existence of isolationism which existed in the twenties, and which permitted the rise of Hitler and Mussolini.

Both branches of Congress passed the Defense Production Act, giving the President power to set up priorities, to allocate scarce materials, to stabilize prices and wages, and to take other steps which might be necessary to mobilize our vast resources in the struggle against communism.

The Congress authorized a 70-group Air Force, removed the limitations on the size of our Army, and authorized the President to call the Reserves and the National Guard to active duty. The Selective Service Act was extended to enable the armed services to obtain all the manpower they required for the safety and security of America. The Congress voted allowances to dependents of men taken into military service, so the hardships their families would have to undergo could be substantially alleviated.

Approval was given to a bill to increase taxes on the incomes of corporations and individuals, to raise some of the revenue necessary to meet the costs of defense. The Congress took the first steps toward the creation of an excess-profits tax, to make sure no one would squeeze profits out of our mobilization for the fight to defeat communism.

In the first session of this Congress, Democratic leaders tried hard to repeal the repressive Taft-Hartley Act, because experience had demonstrated this law was not a fair one. The Lucas amendment to remove the injunction provision from the act failed by only one vote.

In both sessions, the Democratic leaders strove to obtain civil-rights legislation desired by millions of Americans. Efforts in the Senate were frustrated when a majority of the Republican Senators failed to back Vice President BARKLEY on a ruling which would have opened the way for consideration of civil rights bills.

This Congress expanded the REA and the soil-conservation programs which have helped our farm families to enjoy greater comfort and prosperity. Both Houses passed a rural telephone bill to make it possible for thousands of farm homes to be linked to our telephone networks. Many of these phones have already been installed in farmhouses across America.

This Congress approved 27 governmental reorganization plans submitted by the President on the basis of the Hoover Commission's proposals. These plans will save American taxpayers billions of dollars in the coming years. They represent the right kind of Government economy—sane and scientific economy, to improve and streamline the Federal services.

This Congress repealed the Federal tax on oleomargarine, making this nutritious product available at lower prices for millions of American families.

Measures for the unification of our Armed Forces were approved. The success of unification was proved under battle conditions in Korea, where the Army, the Navy, the Marines, and the Air Force worked as one great team to achieve military miracles.

This Congress also established the National Science Foundation, for the purpose of conducting fundamental research in medicine and other fields of knowledge—to keep America in the forefront of world progress.

As the Eighty-first Congress neared the end of its work, the American people reached peaks of power and prosperity they had never attained before.

More than 62,000,000 people had good jobs at good wages.

More than 1,000,000 new homes were placed under construction in 1949 and again in 1950.

The production of new cars approached the rate of more than 7,000,000 cars a year.

The value of goods and services produced by the American people was running at the rate of $270,000,000,000 a year.

In two long and stormy sessions, the Democratic Eighty-first Congress has faced test after test, and responded to each challenge with courage and vision.

The Eighty-first Congress stayed on the job when the going was rough, and despite many obstructions has met most of the basic needs of the American people.

Following is a detailed summary of the major legislation considered by this Congress up to the time of the recess on September 23, 1950:

SUMMARY OF MAJOR LEGISLATION, EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION (JANUARY 3 THROUGH SEPTEMBER 23, 1950)

Agriculture

House Joint Resolution 398: This resolution as adopted authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to correct certain inequities which have resulted from the application of cotton and peanut acreage allotments for the first time since the war. In some instances adjoining farms of the same size were given greatly different acreage allotments. This resolution authorized an increase in the 1950 national acreage allotments for cotton and peanuts and thereby made available additional acreage to assign to those farmers who, under the operation of the existing law, were assigned inadequate acreages.

This resolution prohibits price supports for the 1951 crop of potatoes unless marketing quotas are in force in respect to such potatoes.

Adopted by Senate February 27, 1950, by a vote of 53 to 24. Conference report adopted by the House March 22, 1950, by a vote of 197 to 156; adopted by the Senate March 23, 1950, by a vote of 37 to 33. (Public Law 471. Approved March 31, 1950.)

Commodity Credit Corporation

H. R. 6567: To increase by $2,000,000,000 the borrowing power of Commodity Credit Corporation.

This act increases the borrowing authority of Commodity Credit Corporation from $4,750,000,000 to $6,750,000,000. The necessity for the increase is due to the greatly expanded operations of the farm price-support program. The act provides that the conditions under which this country could invoke import fees or quotas on agricultural commodities in order to prevent disruption of domestic farm programs shall be continued in any future international trade agreement.

Passed Senate June 6, 1950, by a vote of 46 to 5. Conference report adopted by the House June 21, 1950, by a vote of 166 to 84; adopted by the Senate June 26, 1950, by a vote of 36 to 35. (Public Law 579. Approved June 28, 1950.)

Rural Rehabilitation

S. 930: To provide for the liquidation of trust funds now held by the Secretary of Agriculture in the name of State Rural Rehabilitation Corporation.

This act provides for the liquidation of trust funds created under transfer agreements between State rural rehabilitation corporations and the Secretary of Agriculture. These corporations were organized in 1934–35 to assist the Federal and State Governments in the administration of funds provided by the Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933. The funds would be returned to the State corporations upon application by the corporation. (Public Law 499. Approved May 3, 1950.)

Forest Service

H. R. 5839: This act makes a number of relatively minor changes in the laws relating to the Forest Service which will save the Government money through more effective and efficient use of existing appropriations. These changes include: Setting up advisory boards, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to grant 10-year grazing permits; and earmarking a certain proportion of grazing fees for revegetation, construction of range improvements, control of rodents, and destruction of poisonous plants on the range. (Public Law 478. Approved April 24, 1950.)

Agricultural Commodities—Marketing

H. R. 5511: This act amends the provisions of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act of 1930, to increase the license fee from $10 to $15 for commission merchants and dealers in perishable agricultural commodities. This increase will enable the act to again be largely self-supporting. The act has for 20 years aided in suppressing fraudulent and unfair practices in the marketing of fruits and vegetables in interstate or foreign commerce, and its activities have become an integral part of the marketing of fruit and vegetables. It has the unanimous support of both producers and handlers in the fruit and vegetable industry. (Public Law 554. Approved June 15, 1950.)

Rice Marketing Quotas

H. R. 7700: This act provides for a national reserve for adjustments of inadequate farm-acreage allotments of not more than one-half of 1 percent of the national-acreage allotment for rice in 1950 and not more than 1 percent thereafter. The 1950 reserve will be in addition to the national allotment and cannot exceed 7,965 acres. After 1950, the reserve will be taken out of the national-acreage allotment. The act also exempts nonirrigated rice produced on farms of 3 acres or less and rice produced outside the continental United States from marketing quotas or acreage allotments. (Public Law 561. Approved June 16, 1950.)

Agricultural Loans

S. 2996: This act makes loans available, of the type formerly made by the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation, to the owners or operators of established farms in any area or region, upon their full personal liability with such security as may be determined by the Secretary. Loans cannot be made: 3 years after the enactment of this bill; in excess of $10,000 to any one borrower; which would increase the total indebtedness of any one borrower beyond $20,000; which would increase the aggregate principal amount of the loans outstanding at any one time to an amount exceeding $2,000,000. (Public Law 665. Approved August 5, 1950.)

Future Farmers of America, Inc.

S. 2868: This act extends the privileges of a congressional charter to the Future Farmers of America. The objects and purposes of the corporation are:

(1) To create, foster, and assist subsidiary chapters composed of students of vocational agriculture in public schools;

(2) To develop character, train for useful citizenship, foster patriotism, develop competent, aggressive rural, and agricultural leadership;

(3) To create and nurture a love of country life by encouraging members to improve the farm home and its surroundings; and

(4) To encourage the practice of thrift. (Public Law 740. Approved August 30, 1950.)

Cooperative Technical Assistance to Forest Landowners

H. R. 7155: This act authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the States to enable them to provide technical services to private forest landowners. Previous legislation restricted the forest management services assistance to farms. The nonfarm owners, who own almost as much forest land as farmers, are in equal need of such technical aid. This act will permit assistance to the nonfarm forest owners as well as to processors of forest products, such as sawmill owners. It is also specified that the new program will be carried out by the Secretary of Agriculture in such manner as to encourage the utilization of private consulting foresters. (Public Law 729. Approved August 25, 1950.)

Mineral Reserve Rights

H. R. 4800: This act establishes a nationally sound, equitable, and uniform policy for transferring Government-reserved mineral rights to those farmers who purchased lands prior to 1946 from the Resettlement Administration or the Farm Security Administration. This act will enable those farmers to obtain ownership of all minerals under their lands, and will place them in the same status as farmers who acquired lands after the passage of the 1946 act. The mineral rights are not to be given to the present landowners. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell these rights to the landowners upon receipt of written applications. In areas where it has been determined there is no active mineral development or leasing, a nominal sale price of $1 per application has been established; where there is active mineral development and leasing, the mineral interests will be sold at the fair market value as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture after appropriate appraisals have been made. (Public Law 760. Approved September 6, 1950.)

Soil Conservation Extension

S. 2636: This act extends the soil-conservation and domestic-allotment programs of 1936 for another 2 years. This legislation has enabled the Secretary of Agriculture to develop programs and make payments directly to the farmers for specific purposes. Increased needs for more production have given the farmers a greater incentive for an effective agricultural conservation program. (Public Law 817. Approved September 23, 1950.)

Soil Conservation Amendment

S. 2635: This bill amends the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act by providing the Secretary of Agriculture discretionary power to set fair prices for conservation materials to be bought in whole or in part with Federal funds. Prior to the enactment of this amendment by the Senate the setting of fair prices was mandatory and, under this bill, the State committee could provide for the setting of fair prices where circumstances warranted or as an alternative, the credit value of the material or service only would be prescribed. This method would permit the farmer to take advantage of lower prices.

Passed Senate July 26, 1950. Pending in House Agriculture Committee.

Agriculture Program in the Virgin Islands

S. 2809: This bill is designed to provide, on a restricted scale, an agricultural program for the Virgin Islands. One of the foremost industries is agriculture and there are more than 55,000 acres of farm land in the Virgin Islands. This bill would provide assistance to the islands and the farmers, and looks toward the day when, as a result of increased agricultural production, the importation of food will be eliminated and deficit spending for the islands' economy can be substantially reduced or, perhaps, terminated.

Passed Senate July 26, 1950. Pending in House Agriculture Committee.

Civil rights

Equality for Women

Senate Joint Resolution 25: To amend the Constitution relative to equal rights for men and women yet safeguard all special legal protection. The resolution must win a two-thirds vote in the House and then be approved by 36 of the 48 States within 7 years to become a part of the Constitution. This article would take effect 1 year after date of ratification.

Senate vote 63 to 19, January 25, 1950. Now pending before a subcommittee of House Judiciary Committee.

Puerto Rico—Government

S. 3336: This act provides that the people of Puerto Rico, through referendum, may call a constitutional convention at which they may form a constitution in accordance with the laws of Puerto Rico. The provisions to be submitted to Congress for its approval and, upon approval by the Congress, the constitution shall become effective in accordance with its terms. (Public Law 600. Approved July 3, 1950.)

Civil Government for Guam

H. R. 7273: This act provides a civil government for the first time in the 52 years since Guam came under the American flag by virtue of the Treaty of Paris at the end of the Spanish-American War in 1898. Up to the present time all the powers of government have been exercised under two Presidential Executive orders, issued by President McKinley in 1898 and by President Truman in 1949. This act permits the people of Guam to govern themselves instead of being governed by the executive branch. It establishes democratic local government for the island under the authority of the Congress, and American citizenship will be conferred upon the approximately 27,000 native Guamanians. A bill of rights is provided; a representative local government formed in the American tradition and an independent judiciary will be created to mete out justice in the true American manner. (Public Law 630. Approved August 1, 1950.)

Fair Employment Practice Commission

H. R. 4453: This bill passed the House on February 23, 1950, and was immediately placed on the Senate Calendar. On October 17, 1949, just 2 days before the close of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee reported, without recommendation, a similar bill, S. 1728, to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, or national origin.

On May 8, 1950, the Senate began consideration on the motion of Senator LUCAS to take up the FEPC bill. Debate on the motion continued until Friday, May 19, when the petition filed by Senator LUCAS to close the debate upon the motion to take up the bill was defeated by a vote of 52 yeas to 32 nays. (Two-thirds majority or 64 votes is required to invoke cloture.)

Again on July 10, 1950, Senator LUCAS made a motion to take up S. 1728 and filed a petition to invoke the cloture rule on that motion. The petition was defeated by a vote of 55 yeas to 33 nays—two-thirds needed to carry. The motion was withdrawn.

Last year an attempt was made to improve the rule for limitation of debate in order to clear the way for legislation in the field of civil rights. Following a 3-weeks debate, the majority of the Republicans joined with other Senators and succeeded in securing Senate approval of an amendment sponsored by the Republican floor leader which requires that two-thirds of the entire Senate membership, or 64, must agree to cut off debate upon any motion to take up a measure. If and when cloture could be obtained upon a motion to take up the measure, it then becomes necessary to obtain the constitutional majority of 64 votes to take up the measure for consideration. It should also be pointed out that on any attempt to change this rule, petition for cloture does not apply on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the changing of the rule.

Antipoll Tax

H. R. 3199: On July 26, 1949, the House voted to remove payment of poll tax as a prerequisite to voting or registering to vote at primaries. This bill, together with Senate bill 1727, is still pending before a 3-man subcommittee, comprised of Senators STENNIS (Mississippi), WITHERS (Kentucky), and WHERRY (Nebraska), in the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

Economic stabilization

H. R. 6743: Amendments to Federal Home Loan Bank Act, and title IV of the National Housing Act.

This act increases the amount of individual accounts that may be insured in savings and loan associations from $5,000 to $10,0000 and provides for an orderly retirement of the capital stock of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation which is now held by the Secretary of the Treasury. An additional $1,000,000,000 financing is granted the home loan banks, which will materially aid the financing and building of homes. (Public Law 576. Approved June 27, 1950.)

National Rent Control

S. 3181: This act extends rent control until December 31, 1950, and permits cities to continue the controls until June 30, 1951, if they so desire. Controls on permanent accommodations in Chicago transient hotels were retained. Counties were given the right to remove controls before December 31. Cities and towns already have that authority.

Passed Senate 36 to 28, June 12, 1950; passed House 202 to 163. House adopted conference report June 21, 1950, 174 to 166. Senate adopted conference report June 21, 1950, 40 to 24. (Public Law 574. Approved June 23, 1950.)

Abacá Production Act of 1950

S. 3520: During World War II there was a critical shortage of the raw material going into the production of cordage. The Philippine Islands, the principal supplier of Manila fiber, was cut off by the Japanese invasion. It, therefore, became necessary to establish in the Western Hemisphere plantations for the production of abacá (manila fiber). At the present time there are approximately 25,000 acres under cultivation in Central America. This act permits the expansion of acreage for cultivation to approximately 50,000 acres in order that the stockpile of this critical material may be kept at the levels considered necessary for any future emergency. (Public Law 683. Approved August 10, 1950.)

District Rent Control

S. 3776: Rent control in the District of Columbia will be continued through January 31, 1951, and thereafter it may be continued for 5 months upon the passage of a joint resolution by the Congress.

Conference report adopted by the Senate June 29, 1950, by a vote of 45 to 23. (Public Law 592. Approved June 30, 1950.)

National Banks

H. R. 1161: This act provides for the conversion of national banking associations into and their merger or consolidation with State banks. It places national banks on a more equal basis with State banks with respect to transferring from one banking system (State or National) to the other, by way of conversion, merger, or consolidation. Heretofore, a State bank could convert into, or consolidate with a national bank by obtaining the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency unless forbidden by the State law in which it is located. A national bank, however, had no statutory right to convert into a State bank, or to consolidate with a State bank under the latter's charter. This act provides such a statutory right without the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency if under the law of the State in which the national bank is located, a State bank may, without the approval of any State authority, convert into or merge or consolidate with a national bank in accordance with Federal law. (Public Law 706. Approved August 17, 1950.)

Import Controls

S. 3550: Authority to exercise import controls on certain products. This act extends import-control authority over fats, oils, rice, and rice products for a 1-year period from June 30, 1950, and adds certain provisions to the law which are intended to mesh the exercise of authority over import controls with the obligations of the United States as a party to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, adopted at the conclusion of the second session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment executed at Geneva, Switzerland, on October 30, 1947. (Public Law 590, Approved June 30, 1950.)

Federal Deposit Insurance Act

S. 2822: This act increases the maximum insurable deposit from $5,000 to $10,000 on individual accounts in FDIC banks, and reduce assessments under a new refund credit system. This change would increase insurance coverage from 96 percent to 98.4 percent of all accounts in insured banks, and from 44.8 percent to 52.4 percent of total deposits in insured banks. The act also provides for the FDIC to pay back to member banks up to 60 percent of the insurance premiums they pay each year. The act also gives FDIC special examiners the right to inspect member banks which are not under the Federal Reserve System. (Public Law 797. Approved September 22, 1950.)

Federal Reserve Banks

S. 3527: This act extends the authority of the Federal Reserve System to purchase up to $5,000,000,000 worth of obligations from the United States Treasury under the open-market program for 2 years dating from June 30, 1950.

This direct-purchase authority is a useful mechanism whereby the Treasury Department of the Federal Reserve System can coordinate financing requirements of the Treasury with the requirements of the Federal Reserve System in regulating bank reserves in the money market. This authority provides an aid in stabilizing the securities and money markets without which the Treasury would feel obligated to carry larger cash balances, a procedure which would increase interest costs to the Government. (Public Law 589. Approved June 30, 1950.)

Small Business

Senate Resolution 58: This resolution provides a permanent select committee on small business consisting of 13 Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate at the beginning of each Congress to make investigations on small-business problems. The present members are: SPARKMAN, MCFARLAND, O'CONOR, LONG, GILLETTE, HUMPHREY, HUNT, BENTON, TOBEY, SALTONSTALL, THYE, HENDRICKSON, and SCHOEPPEL.

Adopted by Senate February 20, 1950, by a vote of 55 to 27.

Business Information

S. 868: This act establishes a clearinghouse in the Department of Commerce for the dissemination of technological information obtained from foreign and domestic sources which would be of value to American industry, particularly small businesses which have limited research facilities and technical staffs, and provide a needed reference source of technical information for the benefit of all American business. (Public Law 776. Approved September 9, 1950.)

Health

Physically Handicapped

S. 4051: This bill provides for an extension of the program for the vocational rehabilitation of the handicapped. Prior to the passage of this bill, the program cared for only about 55,000 persons and each year there are approximately a quarter of a million persons newly disabled who need rehabilitating.

This bill authorizes State agencies to institute new services, and provides Federal grants-in-aid for such services. For the first time, it brings Federal funds to the support of the program for the blind.

Passed Senate September 13, 1950. Pending in House Committee on Education and Labor.

Housing

S. 2246: This act expands and supplements existing Federal housing legislation and serves the following broad purposes:

1. It continues Federal assistance to private housing production but on the basis that will stimulate production at lower cost and larger size to meet the needs for larger families which prior legislation has failed to do.

2. Establishes an orderly and feasible policy for the further use and disposal of federally owned war housing.

3. Makes home loans to veterans more widely effective and more widely available by broadening the base for GI guaranties and by enabling the Government to make such loans if they cannot be obtained from private sources.

4. Makes Federal loans available for housing at educational institutions.

In addition to the above, the act continues other aid currently in effect including FHA insurance on a more liberal basis and other phases of the housing program now in effect. (Public Law 475. Approved April 20, 1950.)

Housing—Military Installations

H. R. 7846: This act amends Public Law 211, Eighty-first Congress, first session, which provided special FHA mortgage insurance and other incentives for the construction by private enterprise of housing on military installations.

The program has been delayed because it was found impractical to operate under the law where the builder or bidder himself is required to submit plans for proposed houses. This act requires the Secretary of Defense to decide on the type housing needed, and then permit the prospective builders to bid competitively on that basis. (Public Law 498. Approved May 2, 1950.)

Slum Clearance

S. 3635: This act enables the governments of Alaska, of Hawaii, of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands to authorize slum clearance, urban redevelopment, and low-rent housing activities and will overcome a number of technical obstacles which have prevented or impeded participation in the Housing Act of 1949. (Public Law 615. Approved July 18, 1950.)

International relations

ECA

H. R. 7797: To amend the ECA Act of 1948, as amended.

This act extends Economic Cooperation Act until June 30, 1951, and authorizes the following funds for economic aid abroad:

Passed House March 31, 1950, 287 to 86; passed Senate 60 to 8.

House adopted conference report 247 to 88; Senate adopted 47 to 27. (Public Law 535. Approved June 5, 1950.)

Mutual Defense Program

S. 3809: To amend the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

This act extends the mutual defense assistance program and authorizes $1,222,500,000; $1,000,000,000 for North Atlantic Treaty countries, making available to them production equipment as well as machine tools; $131,500,000 for Greece, Turkey, and Iran; $16,000,000 for Korea and Philippines; $75,000,000 for area of China. Additional $250,000,000 worth of surplus materials authorized. President can use up to 10 percent of total provided for in the act for any other country than those mentioned. The President is required to terminate assistance to any country that is not making its full contribution toward defense.

The Congress considered this measure after the outbreak of the war in Korea. Passed Senate June 30, 1950, by a vote of 66 to 0. Passed House 362 to 1. (Public Law 621. Approved July 26, 1950.)

Far Eastern Economic Assistance

S. 2319: This act extends an existing authorization of assistance to areas of China not under Communist forces. Of the $104,000,000 now unobligated, the Administration expects to obligate $10,500,000 of this amount between February 15 and June 30, 1950; authorizes the expenditure of $60,000,000 to aid Korea from February 15 to June 30, 1950, but terminates this aid to Korea should a coalition government be formed including one or more members of the Communist Party or the present government now in control of northern Korea. (Public Law 447. Approved February 14, 1950.)

International Claims Settlement Act

H. R. 4406: This act creates in the Department of State a three-person commission—International Claims Commission of the United States—to handle nationalization claims for nonenemy countries. It establishes the procedures and provides the mechanism to apportion the money received by the United States among the claimants in accordance with the agreement between the United States Government and the Government in Yugoslavia on July 19, 1948. (Public Law 455. Approved March 10, 1950.)

Liberalize the Displaced Persons Act

H. R. 4567: This act changes the cut-off date from December 22, 1945, to January 1, 1949, and extends the act itself to June 30, 1951; increases the number of admissible aliens from 205,000 to 341,000 displaced persons, 5,000 nonquota war orphans and 54,744 expellees over a 3-year period beginning July 1, 1948; provides funds for transportation; eliminates the requirements that 40 percent of the displaced persons be from the Baltic States and that 30 percent be farmers.

Passed Senate April 5, 1950, by a vote of 58 to 14. (Public Law 555. Approved June 16, 1950.)

Posthumous Decorations

Senate Joint Resolution 166: This resolution, introduced by Senator LUCAS, authorized an appropriate decoration posthumously to crew members of the Navy Privateer who lost their lives in or over the Baltic Sea on April 8, 1950.

Tentative plans in the Department of State call for 24 Iranian students to come to the United States to study at the rate of 8 each year for 3 years, probably in the fields of medicine, public health, and agriculture. S. 3937: This act authorizes an extension of enlistments in the Armed Forces of the United States for a period of not to exceed 12 months, or until July 9, 1951.

The Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps are made up almost entirely of volunteers. These volunteers enlist for a specific period and, unless authorized otherwise by the Congress, when this period of service expires the individuals are entitled to return to a civilian status. The international situation makes it essential that a procedure on extension be authorized by the Congress which permits the President to defer the discharge of these well-trained men to assist in the expansion of our armed services. (Public Law 624. Approved July 27, 1950.)

Armed Forces—Personnel Strength

H. R. 9178: This act suspends the present restrictions on the authorized personnel strengths of the Armed Forces as provided for in the Selective Service Act of 1948, as amended in Public Law 599. The suspension of the statutory ceilings which provided for an over-all active-duty strength of 2,005,882, exclusive of 1-year enlistees, will permit an expansion to any strength for which appropriations are authorized. Because of security reasons, it is not possible to report the size to which it is contemplated that the Armed Forces will be enlarged. (Public Law 655. Approved August 3, 1950.)

One-Year Enlistments

S. 4027: This act suspends until July 9, 1951, the provisions of section 4 (g) of the Selective Service Act of 1948, as amended, permitting enlistments for more than 1 year and permitting enlistees to be sent outside the United States.

Passed Senate August 15, 1950; referred to House Armed Services.

Doctor-Dentist Draft

S. 4029: This act is an amendment to Public Law 599, the Selective Service Act of 1948, as amended, and provides for special registration, classification, and induction of certain medical, dental, and allied specialist categories to support the expanding forces without requiring the large-scale call to active duty, without their consent, of Reserve officers who have had substantial periods of service in World War II. (Public Law 779. Approved September 9, 1950.)

Servicemen's Family Allowances

S. 4071: The Communist aggression in Korea has prompted an extensive expansion in the Armed Forces. National Guard and reservists are being ordered to active duty and thousands of men are being mobilized under the provisions of the Selective Service Act. It has been a traditional policy of our Government to provide allowances for the dependencies of our Armed Forces during periods of mobilization. This act provides:

Grade	Dependents			Allotment contribution
	1	2	Over 2
Private	$45	$67.50	$85	$10
Private first class	45	67.50	85	40
Corporal	45	67.50	85	40
Sergeant	------	67.50	85	60
Staff sergeant	------	67.50	85	60
Technical sergeant	------	67.50	85	80
Master sergeant	------	67.50	85	80

Public Law 771. Approved Sept. 8, 1950.

Free Postage in Specified Areas

S. 3876: This act provides that any first-class letter mail sent by a member of the Armed Forces, while on active duty or in the active service in Korea and such other areas as the President may designate as combat zones or theaters of military operations, to any person in the United States including the Territories and possessions shall be transmitted free of postage. This practice is to be continued through June 30, 1951, unless terminated earlier. (Public Law 609. Approved July 12, 1950.)

Modern Naval Vessels

H. R. 7764: Prior to and during World War II the Navy designed and developed ships of numerous types. During the war the Navy displayed tremendous progress in both equipment and tactics. This progress was high-lighted by the development of the carrier task force which, together with the amphibious forces developed during the period, successfully carried on operations against the enemy. Since the end of hostilities there has been little or no construction or conversion of vessels. This act enables the Navy to initiate a modernization program through the construction of new prototype vessels and the conversion of other vessels. The total new construction authorized is approximately 50,000 tons and the conversion will cover approximately 200,000 tons of ships. This program is not intended, in any way, to affect the supercarrier program. (Public Law 674. Approved August 8, 1950.)

Ships' Security

S. 3859: This act authorizes the President to establish such measures and issue such rules and regulations to control the anchorage and movement of foreign-flag vessels in waters of the United States when the national security is endangered. The President is also given the power to safeguard against destruction, loss, or injury from sabotage or other subversive elements and permits the United States to put in protective measures short of the declaration of a national emergency. Such protection is extended to the Canal Zone and all territory and water, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. (Public Law 679. Approved August 9, 1950.)

Civil Defense

H. R. 8909: This act establishes an Office of Civil Defense in the District of Columbia, headed by a Director of Civil Defense, to be appointed by and responsible to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The Office will prepare a comprehensive plan for civil defense integrated with the plans of the Federal Government and adjoining States and communities; organize, equip, and train civil defense units; and prepare public information programs. (Public Law 686. Approved August 11, 1950.)

Rubber Act Extension

H. R. 7579: This act provides for the continuation of the present program for 2 years, or until June 30, 1952. The necessity for this extension is due to the increased need for rubber and the fact that our continuing supply of natural rubber is critical. This placed upon Congress the responsibility for guaranteeing an uninterrupted production of ample quantities of synthetic rubber. (Public Law 575. Approved June 24, 1950.)

Tin-Smelting Industry

S. 3666: This act extends for 5 years, or until June 30, 1956, the present authority to maintain a domestic tin-smelting industry in the interest of national security.

The present law, which will remain unchanged, authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (1) to buy, sell, and transport tin, tin ore, and tin concentrates; (2) to improve, develop, maintain, and operate by lease or otherwise the Government-owned tin smelter at Texas City, Tex.; and (3) to finance research in tin smelting and processing. (Public Law 723. Approved August 21, 1950.)

Internal Security Act of 1950

H. R. 9490: The purpose of this act is to protect this Nation against Communist aggression and subversion which might threaten our constitutional liberties. The major features are:

1. The internment of dangerous Reds in time of war, invasion, or insurrection.

2. The strengthening of our espionage and sabotage laws.

3. Barring Reds from Government jobs, from work in defense plants, and from obtaining passports. This provision coincides with the Executive order of the President setting up a Loyalty Board which has the power to remove persons who are disloyal to the Government.

4. Revision of immigration laws making possible exclusion of dangerous aliens and deportation of aliens proven to be subversive.

5. The registration of Communist and Communist-front organizations with certain restrictions applicable to registered organizations and members.

6. Outlawing conspiracies to set up a totalitarian dictatorship in the United States.

7. Outlawing picketing or parading near Federal courts.

Passed Senate September 12, 1950, by a vote of 70 to 7.

Senate adopted conference report by a vote of 51 to 7.

House adopted conference report by a vote of 313 to 20.

Veto overridden in Senate September 23 by a vote 57 to 10.

Veto overridden in House September 22, 1950, by a vote of 286 to 48. (Public Law 831. Approved September 23, 1950.)

Coast Guard

S. 4136: This measure is designed to include the Coast Guard in the provisions of the Selective Service Act, to authorize the President to extend enlistments in the Coast Guard and to order members of the Coast Guard Reserve and retired Coast Guard personnel into active duty for a period not to exceed 21 months.

This legislation will implement the Ships' Security Act regarding the control over the anchorage and movement of foreign-flag vessels in waters of the United States. (Public Law 850. Approved September 27, 1950.)

Air Engineering Development

S. 4118: The purpose of this act is to increase the appropriation authorization for the establishment, initial construction, installation, and equipment of the Air Engineering Development Center from $100,000,000 to $157,500,000.

This center will provide facilities to conduct research and development, including the construction and operation of wind tunnels, and for the development and testing of matériel and equipment essential to national defense. (Public Law 799. Approved September 21, 1950.)

National Defense Facilities Act of 1950

H. R. 8594: This act provides for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and joint utilization of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land, for the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States. World War II proved conclusively that a most important part of our military strength lies in a large and well-trained Reserve, including the National Guard. One of the more serious handicaps in developing the Reserve has been the lack of adequate armory facilities. This act will enable the Federal Government, with the combined efforts of the various States, to plan a coordinated and long-range armory construction program for all the civilian components of the Armed Forces, thus strengthening our national defense. (Public Law 783. Approved September 11, 1950.)

Maritime Commission—Liability Insurance

S. 2424: This is stand-by legislation authorizing the Secretary of Commerce, with the approval of the President, to provide war risk and certain marine and liability insurance for the protection of passengers, crew, vessels, and cargoes when endangered by war conditions or threats of war. (Public Law 763. Approved September 7, 1950.)

Alien Army Enlistments

S. 2269: This act permits the Secretary of the Army, with approval of the Secretary of State, to accept specially qualified aliens abroad for enlistment and reenlistment in the Regular Army. The enlistees must be between the ages of 18 and 35, unmarried, and without dependents. The enlistment period is restricted to not less than 5 years and the number in the program at any one time cannot exceed 2,500. The authority to accept such enlistments and reenlistments terminates June 30, 1953. (Public Law 597. Approved June 30, 1950.)

Military Construction

S. 2440: This act provides construction authorization for specific projects required by the Department of Defense and authorizes the appropriation of funds to carry out these projects at locations in the continental United States and overseas. (Public Law 564. Approved June 17, 1950.)

Aeronautical Research

H. R. 3946: This act will promote national defense and contribute to more effective aeronautical research by authorizing professional personnel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics a leave of absence from his regular duties for the purpose of carrying on graduate study or research in institutions of learning. Any leave of absence granted under this act will be without loss of salary or compensation. (Public Law 472. Approved April 11, 1950.)

Army-Navy Nurses Act of 1950

H. R. 5876: This act allows for an increase in the number of Army nurses and adjusts the periods of service necessary for promotion. It is also designed to credit Army nurses with time spent on active duty and with time spent outside the service prior to reenlistment in determining the maximum age limit for enlistment. (Public Law 514. Approved May 16, 1950.)

Women Doctors and Specialists

H. R. 4384. This act permits the Army and the Air Force to secure the services of about 50 additional women physicians and 25 additional women dentists, which will serve to provide a degree of relief for the present shortage of medical, dental, and allied specialist personnel. Qualified women may be appointed in both the Regular and Reserve components of the Army and the Air Force on the same basis as now governs the appointment of qualified men. The Army and the Air Force places them on the same promotion and retirement basis as applies to male officers commissioned in the medical services of the Army and the Air Force.

Passed Senate amended, September 6, 1950. House did not take final action.

Army and Air Force Authorization Act

H. R. 1437: As a result of this act the Air Force will have, for the first time, its own statutory authorization as to its size and composition and procurement program. The Air Force will have an authorized strength not exceeding 70 United States Air Force groups, and such separate United States Air Force squadrons, Reserve groups, and supporting and auxiliary United States Air Force and Reserve units as may be required. (Public Law 604. Approved July 10, 1950.)

Army Organization Act of 1950

H. R. 8198: This act provides a statutory basis for the internal organization of the Army and the Department of the Army. World War II made major changes in Army organization under the First War Powers Act. As postwar demobilization progressed, the wartime organization of the Army was readjusted and certain new laws were enacted which affected the Army such as the National Security Act of 1948, and others. As a result, the organization under which it was functioning, prior to the enactment of this bill, had a precarious statutory basis. This act provides the flexibility in organization necessary to meet developments in the organization of the National Military Establishment. (Public Law 581. Approved June 28, 1950.)

Uniform Code of Military Justice

H. R. 4080: This act provides a single code of justice applicable to all the military departments, i. e., Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard at time of war and peace. It supersedes the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the Disciplinary Laws of the Coast Guard. The code, while based on the Revised Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy, is a consolidation and a complete recodification of the present statutes. It will provide, for the first time in history, a single law for the administration of military justice in the Armed Forces. (Public Law 506. Approved May 5, 1950.)

Regulation and Control of Air Commerce

S. 3995: This act permits the President, in time of war or when the national security is endangered, to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and the Civil Aeronautics Board to control the flight of United States civil aircraft over the United States. The Secretary of Commerce may establish special airspace identification zones and, after consultation with the Department of Defense and the Civil Aeronautics Board, prohibit or restrict within these zones the flights of aircraft which he cannot effectively identify, locate, and control with available radar and other facilities. (Public Law 778. Approved September 9, 1950.)

Gen. George C. Marshall

H. R. 9646: This legislation authorizes the appointment of General of the Army George C. Marshall to the position of Secretary of Defense. In order to make this appointment, it necessitated amending the National Security Act of 1947 as it prohibits the appointment as Secretary of Defense of any individual who, during the previous 10 years, has served on active duty in one of the regular components of the Armed Forces. This exception is limited to the appointment of General Marshall.

Following a bitter attack on the floor led by the Republicans, the bill passed the Senate by a vote of 47 to 21. (Public Law 788. Approved September 18, 1950.)

Defense Housing

S. 4145: The purpose of this measure is to authorize the Housing and Home Finance Agency to use funds now on hand, from the operation of the temporary war housing under its jurisdiction, to erect housing on or near military installations which have been reactivated since the outbreak of the Korean war.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to organize and subscribe for the capital stock of companies formed for the purpose of acquiring real estate, developing and constructing rental housing necessary for national defense; RFC is also authorized to make and manage loans to any such company for the purpose of financing such project plus the general expenses of the company; upon completion of any such project all right, title, and interest must be transferred to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. The total amount of loans to be authorized by RFC must not exceed $100,000,000.

Passed Senate September 15, 1950. Pending in House Banking.

States—Military Forces

S. 4088: The purpose of this legislation is to provide authority, for 2 years following enactment, to the several States, Territories, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, and the Canal Zone to organize military forces and to provide pay and allowances, travel, arms, ammunition, uniforms, equipment, medical, and other military supplies necessary to enable such forces to execute their internal security missions within or without their respective States and Territories to serve while the National Guard is in active Federal service. (Public Law 849. Approved September 27, 1950.)

Natural resources

Federal Reclamation Projects

H. R. 7220: This act expedites the rehabilitation of Federal reclamation projects by permitting repayment installment plans as directed by the Secretary of the Interior to become effective in less than 60 days after their submission to congressional committees, when the committees so approve. (Public Law 451. Approved March 3, 1950.)

Flood Control

H. R. 5472: This is a combined omnibus river and harbor and flood-control bill. The last comprehensive river and harbor and flood-control authorizations were passed in 1946. Additional authorizations are now needed to continue the unified basin water resources developments now in progress and to round out basin programs where changing conditions have shown the necessity for extensions or modifications. In addition to the economic stimulation, these programs constitute a backlog of economically justified public improvements which can be placed under construction at rates of speed and sequence of locations as may be most suitable to variations of unemployment. (Public Law 516. Approved May 17, 1950.)

Eklutna Project

H. R. 940: This act authorizes the construction of the Eklutna project near Anchorage, Alaska, and confers upon the Secretary of the Interior the specific authority to construct, operate, and maintain the project. The project will consist of a low dam at Lake Eklutna, a diversion tunnel and penstock, and a power plant with installed capacity of 30,000 kilowatts transmission lines to Anchorage. (Public Law 628. Approved July 31, 1950.)

Fuel Investigation

Senate Resolution 239: On August 15, 1950, the Senate authorized the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to make a full and complete investigation and study of the available fuel reserves of the United States and the present and probable future rates; to formulate a national fuel policy; to study and recommend methods of encouraging developments to assure the availability of adequate fuels; and to report to the Senate not later than January 2, 1951.

Synthetic Liquid Fuels Act

H. R. 8975: The purpose of this measure is to extend the authorization to operate demonstration plants for testing the possibilities of commercial manufacture of synthetic liquid fuels from coal and oil shale to April 5, 1955.

The continuation of the synthetic-fuels research and development program will benefit the Nation by forestalling or alleviating any oil shortage that may result from either inadequate domestic petroleum production or interruption of supplies from overseas which is essential in the national interest. (Public Law 812. Approved September 22, 1950.)

Reclamation Project

H. R. 1920: This act is designed to prevent speculation in lands resulting from construction of the Columbia Basin Project Act which provides for the establishment of farm units and for the disposal of lands held in excess of a farm unit by a landholder. (Public Law 851. Approved September 27, 1950.)

Palisades Dam Project

S. 2195: This act reauthorizes the construction, operation, and maintenance of the Palisades Dam and Reservoir project in Idaho, including the northside pumping division of the Minidoka project and appurtenant irrigation facilities such as American Falls Dam, power-generating facilities for furnishing electrical power for irrigation. (Public Law 864. Approved September 30, 1950.)

Civil Service Retirement

H. R. 4295: This act amends the Civil Service Retirement Act by providing that any officer or employee who on or before April 1, 1948, had retired on an annuity is entitled to an increase, effective April 1, 1948, or 25 percent, or $300, whichever is the lesser; also provides that if a retired employee did not elect a survivor's annuity, there shall be payable upon his or her death, to his wife or her husband if married before April 1, 1948, an annuity equal to one-half of his or her present annuity but not to exceed $600 per annum during the remainder of the survivor's life. (Public Law 601. Approved July 6, 1950.)

Second-, Third-, and Fourth-Class Mail

This measure authorizes the forwarding or return of second-, third-, and fourth-class matter which is undeliverable as well as perishable goods. (Public Law 536. Approved June 8, 1950.)

Uniform Longevity Grades

H. R. 6553. The purpose of this legislation is to rectify the inequities relating to carriers in the postal field service resulting from the application of Public Law 428, approved on October 28, 1949. It also aids in the establishment of a uniform procedure for determining the eligibility of postal employees for promotion of longevity grades. (Public Law 500. Approved May 3, 1950.)

Providing for a Single Catalog System

House Concurrent Resolution 97: This resolution places the Congress on record as approving a single supply catalog system for all agencies of the Federal Government, both civilian and military, in order that there shall be published and put into use on the earliest practicable date a single supply catalog. During the Second World War there were almost as many catalog systems as there were procurement agencies in the Government which, it has been estimated, cost the Government billions of dollars. It is felt that with this new system not only will there be a financial savings as well as storage and purchase requirements but will also provide a positive system of identification for the procurement of parts should there ever be another war. The Munitions Board will be the central cataloging authority with assistance from General Services Administration.

Budgeting and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950

H. R. 9038: This act provides for modernizing budget and accounting procedures, to supplement the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 advocated by the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, under a joint and continuous program designed to bring about improvement of accounting and financial reporting in the Government by the Comptroller General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. (Public Law 784. Approved September 12, 1950.)

Revision of Hatch Act

H. R. 9023: This act is designed to modify the punitive section of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act commonly known as the Hatch Act. The previous law required the removal of Federal employees who violated the Hatch Act. This act provides that any person violating the provisions of the Hatch Act shall be removed immediately from his position; if, however, the Civil Service Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission. It further provides that in no case shall the penalty be less than 90 days' suspension without pay. Upon request, the Commission may reopen and reconsider the record in such case and if by unanimous vote it is found that the acts committed did not warrant removal, an order may be issued revoking the restriction against reemployment, but no such revocation shall become effective until at least 90 days have elapsed since removal. At the end of each fiscal year the Commission shall report to the President for transmittal to Congress the names, addresses, and nature of employment of all persons against whom such action was taken and the penalty imposed.

This act also amends section 612 of title 18, of the United States Code, to provide that persons who willfully publish or distribute mail (except postal employees in the official discharge of their duties), transport or cause to be transported in interstate commerce any card, pamphlet, circular, poster, and so forth, relating to any person who has publicly declared his intention to seek a political office, which does not contain the names of the persons, associations, committees, or corporations responsible for the publications and the names of the officers shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both. (Public Law 732. Approved August 25, 1950.)

C. O. D. Parcels

S. 3117: This act reduces the free retention period from 20 to 15 days on c. o. d. parcels; authorizes the Postmaster General to direct the immediate return of c. o. d. parcels which are undeliverable at address given; reduces the personnel service costs resulting from numerous handlings. (Public Law 504. Approved May 5, 1950.)

Travel Expense

H. R. 5951: This act authorizes the payment of per diem and transportation expenses to officers and employees of the Government who become ill, or are injured not due to their own misconduct, while traveling on official business. (Public Law 482. Approved April 26, 1950.)

H. R. 7666: This act amends section 12 (e) of the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, to provide an order of precedence for lump-sum death payments as follows:

(1) to the designated beneficiary or beneficiaries; or

(2) to the widow or widower of such person; or

(3) to the child or children of such person and descendants of deceased children by representation; or

(4) to the parents of such person or their survivors; or

(5) to the duly appointed executor or administrator of the estate of such persons; or

(6) to the other next of kin of such person as may be determined by the Civil Service Commission to be entitled under the laws of the domicile of such employee at the time of his death. (Public Law 547. Approved June 14, 1950.)

Post Office Financial Control Act of 1950

H. R. 8923: This act is designed to provide improved procedures with respect to the financial control of the Post Office Department as recommended by the Hoover Commission report. It modernizes and improves the accounting and auditing of the Post Office Department and implements the Department's new budget procedure. (Public Law 712. Approved August 17, 1950.)

Research and education

National Science Foundation

S. 247: This act is designed to develop and encourage the pursuit of a national policy for the promotion of basic research and education in the sciences, through grants of scholarships and graduate fellowships and the interchange of scientific information. World War II revealed our urgent need for an agency of the Government, to function in time of peace as well as war, to promote and foster fundamental research in the sciences which are not likely to be carried on privately because of the size and difficulty of the problems and because of the lack of an immediate commercial value.

The National Science Foundation will initiate and support basic scientific research through contracts or other arrangements and, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, initiate and support scientific research in connection with national defense. It will also serve to foster the interchange of scientific information among scientists in the United States and foreign countries and will correlate its research programs with other scientific research programs of individuals and public and private groups. Our national health, prosperity, social welfare, and security will be aided materially by such a foundation. (Public Law 507. Approved May 10, 1950.)

Vocational Education Act

S. 493: This act authorizes an annual grant of $40,000 for use in a vocational education program in the Virgin Islands. In the enactment of the Vocational Education Act of 1946, which amended the George-Deen Act of 1936, the Virgin Islands were completely overlooked although grants-in-aid to the several States had been extended to the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, the island of Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. This discrimination was unjustifiable especially in view of the fact that more than a thousand Virgin Islanders were members of the Armed Forces and many additional thousands were affected by the dislocations produced by the war. (Public Law 462. Approved March 18, 1950.)

School Construction Act

S. 2317: This act authorizes a 3-year program calling for the construction of critically needed school facilities in those school districts overburdened by Federal activities. Twenty-five million dollars has been appropriated for this program of which $3,000,000 will be used for survey purposes, plus $25,000,000 contract authority. (Public Law 815. Approved September 23, 1950.)

School Assistance Act

H. R. 7940: This act complements the School Construction Act, Public Law 815, by authorizing the expenditure of funds for operating-expense purposes in those school districts overburdened by Federal activities. This act authorizes a 4-year program of educational aid to those school districts having large increases in enrollments due to the movement of Federal activities and the corollary movement of Federal employees. (Public Law 874. Approved September 30, 1950.)

Social welfare

Navajo and Hopi Tribes

S. 2734: This act authorizes $88,570,000 for a program rehabilitating the Navajo and Hopi Tribes of Indians and for the better utilization of the resources of their reservations. (Public Law 474. Approved April 19, 1950.)

Indian Irrigation Projects

H. R. 8199: This act extends the period of time allowed the irrigation districts of the Flathead Indian irrigation projects to execute new repayment contracts. (Public Law 528. Approved May 25, 1950.)

Social Security

H. R. 6000: This act extends old-age and survivor insurance coverage to approximately 10,000,000 additional persons, making the total number covered approximately 45,000,000 persons. Among the new groups, included are 5,000,000 nonfarm self-employed excluding professionals such as lawyers and doctors; 900,000 regularly farm-employed workers; 1,000,000 domestic servants employed 24 days and paid $50 by one employer in any calendar quarter; "casual" laborers on the same basis as domestic servants; certain Federal civilian employees not covered by the Federal retirement program; employees of certain publicly owned transit systems; outside salesmen; Americans employed abroad by American concerns; and optional coverage for employees of certain nonprofit organizations. Monthly benefits for approximately 3,000,000 persons now receiving would be increased on the average from $26 a month to more than $48, or more than 85 percent. The lowest benefit groups would be increased more than 100 percent. This act, in accordance with their desires, totally excludes State and local government employees such as policemen, firemen, teachers, and other employees of counties and municipalities since they feel their pension systems are far more beneficial to them than coverage under this act.

The new computing formula would provide 50 percent of the first $100 of average monthly wage, plus 15 percent of the next $200, based on the maximum wage-tax base of $3,600. The minimum benefits would be increased to $25 and the maximum benefits would be increased to $150, but the maximum could not exceed 80 percent of the average monthly wage of the insured. World War II veterans are granted wage credits of $160 a month for time spent in military or naval service between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947.

Present payroll taxes of 1½ percent each on workers and employers are continued through 1955. In 1956 the rates will rise to 2 percent and will increase gradually to 3¼ percent by 1970.

Passed House by a vote of 333 to 14. Passed Senate June 20, 1950, by a vote of 81 to 2. (Public Law 734. Approved August 28, 1950.)

Major Disasters

H. R. 8396: This act authorizes $5,000,000 to cover disasters occurring anywhere in the entire country. This legislation provides for an orderly and continuing method of rendering assistance to the States and local governments in alleviating suffering and damage resulting from a major peacetime disaster, in restoring public facilities and in supplementing whatever aid the State or local governments can render themselves. A major disaster is defined as any flood, drought, fire, hurricane, earthquake, storm, or other catastrophe. (Public Law 875. Approved September 30, 1950.)

Revenue Act of 1950

H. R. 8920: This act, which is a direct result of the Communist aggression in Korea, increases tax liabilities by approximately $5,000,000,000. The change in withholding rates on individuals becomes effective on October 1, 1950, and the increase in the corporate rate for 1950 is approximately one-half of the rate which will be effective in 1951 and subsequent years. A tax is levied on the investment income of life insurance companies over the last 2 years, 1949 and 1950. The only provisions relating to excise taxes are those which will provide additional revenue. The act tightens up on the operations of tax-exempt charitable trusts and foundations, to prevent them from being used for the benefit of their creators, and from making investments of an unsound nature. Income tax exemptions have been allowed the Armed Forces serving in combat areas—commissioned officers will be allowed not in excess of $200 a month and the income of noncommissioned officers will be excluded from tax.

The Congress has directed the Committees on House Ways and Means and Senate Finance to report a bill raising revenue by levying, collection, and payment of corporate excess profits taxes with retroactive effect to October 1 or July 1, 1950, to the Eighty-first Congress as early as practicable after November 15, 1950, if the Congress is in session. If Congress is not in session, the bill is to be reported as early as practicable during the first session of the Eighty-second Congress. (Public Law 814. Approved September 23, 1950.)

Repeal of Oleomargarine Tax

H. R. 2023: This act requires that oleomargarine, when served in eating places, be served in triangular shaped patties; when sold in stores, the external wrapper shall bear the word "Oleomargarine" or "Margarine" in type as large as any letter on the label and shall list all the ingredients; wrapper of internal contents shall also bear the name "Oleomargarine" or "Margarine" in letters 20 points or more high (¼ inch). Federal taxes repealed are:

Colored oleo at retail, 10 cents pound;

Uncolored at retail, one-fourth cent a pound;

Six hundred dollars a year on oleo manufacturers;

Four hundred and eighty dollars a year on wholesalers of colored product;

Two hundred dollars a year on wholesale of uncolored;

Forty-eight dollars a year on each retailer of the colored product;

Six dollars a year on retailers of the uncolored. (Public Law 459. Approved March 16, 1950.)

Distilled Spirits Tax

H. R. 5486: This act modernizes present requirements and procedures for warehousing and tax payment of domestically distilled spirits by providing for the use of tax-stamp machines as an alternative method of paying the tax; provides for the collection of tax on the actual quantity only of distilled spirits which are removed from bond at the time of tax payment; also terminates certain wartime legislation enacted for the purpose of enabling the distillers to manufacture spirits for munitions and industrial purposes. (Public Law 448. Approved February 21, 1950.)

Metal Scrap

H. R. 5327: This act continues until June 30, 1951, the suspension of duties and import taxes on metal scrap. The word "scrap" as used in this act shall mean all ferrous and nonferrous materials and articles, of which ferrous or nonferrous metal is the component material of chief value, which are second-hand or waste or refuse, or are obsolete, defective or damaged, and which are suitable only for remanufacture. (Public Law 869. Approved September 30, 1950.)

Foreign-Trade Zones

H. R. 5332: This act amends section 3 of the act of June 18, 1934, relating to the establishment of foreign-trade zones. Under the act of June 18, 1934, manufacturing and exhibiting within a foreign-trade zone was prohibited. This act permits foreign goods to be fabricated, assembled, and displayed in foreign-trade zones—restricted areas near United States ports where products can be stored temporarily without payment of import duties. (Public Law 566. Approved June 17, 1950.)

Estate and Gift Taxes

House Joint Resolution 480: This resolution extends to July 1, 1951, the period for tax-free release of powers of appointment credited on or before the effective date of the Revenue Act, which was October 21, 1942.

The Revenue Act of 1942 made a number of significant changes in the treatment, under the estate and gift taxes, of property which is subject to a power of appointment created by a person other than the holder of the power. In order to enable holders of previously created powers to adjust their affairs, it was provided that such persons could release their powers within a prescribed period of time without incurring any tax liability. This period has been extended from time to time because of the many difficulties individuals have encountered in making the necessary adjustments. (Public Law 578. Approved June 27, 1950.)

Transportation

S. 2436—Alaskan Airports: This act authorizes an additional $4,000,000 for the construction, protection, operation, and maintenance of public airports in the Territory of Alaska. (Public Law 454. Approved March 10, 1950.)

S. 456—New District of Columbia Airport: The purpose of this act is to authorize the construction and operation of a second public airport to relieve the congestion at Washington National Airport and to allow for future increases in commercial air traffic here. It has been estimated, conservatively, that by 1955 the air traffic will have increased by 40 percent and it has been determined that the Washington National Airport facilities at present cannot be expanded because of encroachment upon the channel of the Potomac River. To insure a greater degree of safety it has been concluded that an additional airport for the Washington metropolitan area must be constructed. (Public Law 762. Approved September 7, 1950.)

S. 2875—Federal Airport Act of 1946, extension: This act extends for a periods of 5 years the time for appropriating and expending funds to carry out the Federal Airport Act beyond the present termination date of June 30, 1953. The present act authorized a 7-year program, with a top limitation of $520,000,000. This extension did not increase the amount of the authorized appropriation—it simply allows additional time for the completion of the program or until June 30, 1958. (Public Law 846. Approved September 27, 1950.)

S. 3771—Permitting Canadian vessels to transport merchandise and pasengers between Alaskan ports and continental United States for a temporary period: This act extends until June 30, 1951, temporary waivers of laws protecting American-flag shipping in order to provide adequate transportation for three small communities in southeastern Alaska. Since the volume of passenger traffic to and from Skagway and Haines does not permit operation of adequate passenger service to these ports and since Hyder has no passenger or cargo service by American-flag vessels, the only feasible aid for these communities is to permit Canadian vessels to continue calling at these ports. (Public Law 584. Approved June 29, 1950.)

H. R. 5990—Baltimore-Washington Parkway: This act provides for the construction, development, administration, and maintenance of the Baltimore-Washington Parkway in the State of Maryland as a Federal-aid project. The present Baltimore Boulevard is overcrowded to such an extent that accidents occur far more frequently than on the average 4-lane highway. Further widening of this route would be difficult because of the property development that would create rights-of-way problems. The new highway will have divided lanes, limited access, grade-crossing separation, and restricted truck traffic. (Public Law 643. Approved August 8, 1950.)

Federal Aid to Highways

H. R. 7941: This act continues the Federal aid road program which was initiated in 1916 and has been conducted so successfully since its inception.

This act authorizes $1,188,150,000 for Federal aid to highways and other road construction for a 2-year period ending June 30, 1953. This represents a savings of approximately $26,000,000 from the amount recommended by the Senate committee. This aid is to be matched by the various States participating. Following is a breakdown figured on a 1-year basis:

Primary road, secondary, urban	$500,000,000
Forest highways	20,000,000
Forest roads and trails	17,500,000
Alaska-Tongass Forest roads	3,500,000
Park roads and trails	10,000,000
Parkways	13,000,000
Indian roads	6,000,000
Emergency fund	5,000,000
Roads on public domain	5,000,000
Inter-American Highway	4,000,000
Defense Highway Act	10,000,000
Safety conference	75,000
Total	594,075,000

(Public Law 769. Approved September 7, 1950.)

Panama Canal

H. R. 8677: The purpose of this legislation is to improve the organization of the Panama Canal and to establish an equitable and proper base for the collection of tolls. (Public Law 841. Approved September 26, 1950.)

Ship Sales Act

S. 3571: This act continues the authority of the Secretary of Commerce, under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, to sell war-built ships until January 15, 1951; charters on war-built dry-cargo vessels existing on June 30, 1950, may be continued to October 31, 1950; charters on passenger vessels existing on June 30, 1950, may be continued until December 31, 1951, or until expiration thereof by the terms of their provisions; also provides for the continuation to January 15, 1951, the authority of the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to grant waivers of navigation and vessel-inspection laws except in the case of laws regulating employment of aliens or requiring a vessel to have a full crew. (Public Law 591. Approved June 30, 1950.)

Great Lakes Shipping

H. R. 8847: The purpose of this legislation is to develop and maintain package freight and passenger service on the Great Lakes by permitting 10 surplus, war-built, Government vessels to be sold for operation on the Great Lakes on substantially the same basis as vessels can now be purchased under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946 for use on the oceans. (Public Law 856. Approved September 28, 1950.)

Veterans

Postal Employees

H. R. 4285: This act amends the act of July 31, 1946, to retroactively advance in grade, time in grade, and compensation, certain postal field employees who are veterans of World War II. This increase in the pay rates of certain substitutes is designed to benefit those who are actually receiving less pay than they otherwise would have received had they been privileged to accept appointments in the field service between May 1, 1940, and October 28, 1943. (Public Law 492. Approved April 29, 1950.)

Veterans—Tuberculosis

H. R. 7440: This act provides that World War II veterans who have active pulmonary tuberculosis develop with a 10 percent or more disability, within 3 years after separation from active service shall be considered as having been incurred or aggravated by active service. (Public Law 573. Approved June 23, 1950.)

Veterans' Patents

H. R. 4692: This act provides for an extension of the life of patents issued to veterans of World War II, on the theory that their service would have in many cases precluded them from exploiting their patents during that period.

This act permits an honorably discharged veteran of World War II, who served for all or a part of the period between December 7, 1941, and September 2, 1945, and to whom had been issued or who has continuously owned since a time prior to September 2, 1945, a patent whose original term had not expired before the latter date, to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the term of his patent equal to twice the portion of his military or naval service between the dates of December 7, 1941, and September 2, 1945. (Public Law 598. Approved June 30, 1950.)

Veterans—Mothers

S. 3263: This bill, as passed by the Senate, grants preference in Federal employment to the mother of a deceased son or daughter whose life was lost on active duty, or of a son or daughter who is a service-connected permanently and totally disabled ex-serviceman or ex-servicewoman, honorably discharged, where the father of the deceased or disabled ex-service man or woman is totally and permanently disabled; or where, if the father is dead, divorced, or separated from the mother of the deceased or disabled ex-service man or woman and the mother has remarried, and the second husband is totally and permanently disabled.

Passed Senate August 8, 1950. House Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

Veterans—Education

S. 2596: This act clarifies the intent of Congress on the proper interpretation of the GI Bill regarding veterans' educational training benefits. Specifically, it continues the provision of Public Law 266 requiring the disapproval of courses in institutions having been in operation for a period less than a year prior to the date of enrollment unless such enrollment was prior to August 24, 1949. Certain exceptions are provided for to do away with inequities which have been caused in the past. Provision is also made whereby the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration may deny initiation of any course only if he finds (1) that the veteran is not eligible by reason of the July 25, 1951, cut-off date, or (2) that it is not in the same general field as his original educational or occupational objective and that such veteran has already made one change from one general field to another, or (3) that it is precluded by reason of the fact that it has been found to be avocational or recreational in character. (Public Law 610. Approved July 13, 1950.)

Veterans—Conveyances for Certain Disabled Veterans

S. 3768: This act is a 1-year extension of Public Law 663, Seventy-ninth Congress, which was the first law giving automobiles to veterans who had lost the use of one or both legs above the ankle. The present law expired on June 30, 1950, and it has been estimated that there are approximately 150 cases remaining for the year of 1950 and about 350 cases for 1951 which cannot be approved without this extension. This act provides the sum of $600,000. The only change made in the law is to permit the veteran to pay the difference in cost of an automobile over and above the $1,600 which was not permitted under the 1950 law. (Public Law 798. Approved September 21, 1950.)

Spanish-American War Veterans

H. R. 6217: This act provides out-patient medical care for approximately 100,000 Spanish-American War veterans in non-service connected diseases or disability cases. (Public Law 751. September 19, 1950.)

A Report to the People of the Third Congressional District of Illinois

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NEIL J. LINEHAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. LINEHAN. Mr. Speaker, in 1948 I pledged my efforts to true representation for the people of the Third Congressional District of Illinois. In recognition of my obligations to the people of our district, whom I am honored to represent in the Congress, I should like to report briefly to them on the landmark legislative actions of the Eighty-first Congress.

The world we live in today is beset by an aggressive element, inimical to our traditions and institutions, and seeking only the path to world domination. As Americans we have dedicated ourselves to the pursuit of peace. Our every act and intention has been predicated upon that cherished desire.

A godless state, fostering the materialistic, the Soviet Union today threatens the peace of the world. This communistic octopus has since 1945 absorbed and taken over 7,500,000 square miles of new territory and has subjugated 500,000,000 people to its police-state control. Soviet expansion has wiped from the map Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Seven nations independent before 1939—Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Czechoslovakia, and China—have lost their independence and become satellites of communism.

In this world of unrest the Democratic administration has stood as a bulwark for the preservation of the ideals of freedom and human dignity. The Eighty-first Congress has been in the vanguard of the western bloc striving for peace throughout our world. Public opinion has sought a solution for these international crises; our national affairs have had to be, therefore, necessarily subordinated. Our Federal Budget has been weighted with the demands upon it for the halting of aggressive action from without. Indeed, national problems and expenditures could be easily dealt with if the costs of war were forever removed.

Our insistence upon and support of the United Nations, our timely Marshall plan, and the point-4 program all have aided in turning the tide of communism in Europe. Our foreign policy has been based on the preservation of an orderly community of free nations; to this end we sponsored the United Nations. The Marshall plan was our answer to countries seeking to rebuild on the ashes of a Second World War. Its success has stemmed the flow of communism and rescued Europe from the iron curtain.

President Truman's point-4 program is the challenge to aggressors in underdeveloped backward countries. The Eighty-first Congress has sought to provide these people with the technical and agricultural know-how for improving the standards of their national economies. The United States has thereby placed at the disposal of these nations a means whereby they may help themselves. The North Atlantic Treaty and military assistance pact for Europe are steps to strengthen and solidify the western bloc against encroachments from the grasping tentacles of communistic influence.

We live in a world of uncertainty; but we have a plan for survival. This plan will enable us to preserve our liberties, freedom, and way of life.

The Korean war has served, despite its sufferings, to cement the nations of the Western World against any further act of aggression. With a love of God and our neighbor, with courage and the ability to face up to realities, we shall succeed in the course we have set for ourselves.

DOMESTIC ISSUES—SOCIAL-SECURITY AMENDMENTS, 1950

One of the outstanding accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress was the passage of the Social Security Act of 1950, extending the benefits of its old-age and survivors benefits program to over 10,000,000 additional persons. The following important changes are recited:

Extension of coverage to self-employed persons other than farmers and certain professional persons.

Coverage of regularly employed domestic workers.

Coverage of State and local government employees not members of retirement systems, through voluntary agreements between the State and the Federal Government, and compulsory coverage of certain employees of certain transit systems taken over by States or local governments after 1936.

A substantial liberalization of the benefit formula for future beneficiaries.

Increase in the wage base for benefit and contribution purposes from $3,000 to $3,600.

A substantial increase in benefits for current beneficiaries, averaging 77½ percent.

Payment of benefits to dependent husbands and widowers of insured women workers.

Liberalization of survivors insurance benefits with respect to insured married women.

Payment of the lump-sum death benefit in all cases of insured deceased workers.

Increase in the benefits for dependent parents and for the first child in a family from 50 to 75 percent of the primary insurance benefit.

Provision of wage credits of $160 for each month of the military service during World War II.

Provisions for Federal grants to the States for the needy permanently and totally disabled.

Inclusion in aid to dependent children of one adult relative in a family, for Federal matching purposes.

Provision for mandatory exemption of $50 earned income for the blind, beginning July 1952.

SUBVERSIVE CONTROL—ANTICOMMUNIST LAW

This legislation—the McCarran Act—requires registration of Communists and subversives. It bars Communists from Federal jobs and tightens restrictions on aliens and immigration. Its provisions assure a round-up of all Communists and other subversive elements in a time of national emergency.

HOUSING

The present war circumstances have necessarily diminished the scope of the housing program; however, the Housing Act of 1950 expands and clarifies the Federal Housing Act. With its increases in the limit on mortgage purchases by the Government, this measure is of distinct aid to the moderate-income families. A liberalized scheduled of financing on FHA rental and cooperative housing will prove a boon to all, particularly our veterans.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

The Eighty-first Congress liberalized many procedures involving payments for various types of disabilities. In bettering the administration of the GI bill of rights the Congress has eliminated many abuses arising out of providing assistance to veterans for educational purposes.

Congress also enacted laws permitting the payment to veterans of retroactive benefits during hospitalization. A time extension was also enacted for filing in certain cases claiming benefit and compensation. Another prominent action increased from 75 to 100 percent the payment rates for presumed service-connected disabilities. Over $60,000,000,000 has been spent to date on benefits and services for veterans of all of our wars.

PUBLIC HEALTH

Federal aid for hospital construction was extended to 1955. Research and training in the search for cures for rheumatism, arthritis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, and other diseases is concerned in Public Law 692. Another law, Public Law 754, now permits property, surplus to the needs of the Federal Government, to be shared by public health institutions.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY AID

A 2-year program of Federal aid to highway construction has been assured by law with the authorization of $1,138,000,000. This will keep our highway system the best in the world, a pride and artery in peacetime, a necessity in wartime.

DISPLACED PERSONS ACT OF 1950

The number of displaced persons who may be admitted to the United States was raised from 205,000 to 415,744 by action of the Eighty-first Congress. Regular immigration quotas allotted abroad will cover this increase. Every basis for a charge of discrimination has been eliminated. A careful screening by the security agencies of the Government, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Immigration, Defense, and State Departments has been provided.

REORGANIZATION

Congress accepted 27 of the 35 reorganization plans submitted to it by the President. These plans included realinement of functions and streamlining of housekeeping in the vast executive branch of the Government. Further, they provided for the centralization of authority as well as responsibility in the heads of the various departments and agencies. With the elimination of duplicative practices and overlapping functions in the various departments, management experts predict savings of over $1,000,000,000 in the Federal Government, with concomitant increased efficiency and meritorious economy in governmental services. I have supported many reorganization plans (except plan No. 27 for a Department of Health, Education and Security) because of my study of the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, headed by our only living ex-President.

I have taken an unequivocal stand for rebuilding the Labor Department and improving the National Labor Relations Board framework. On the occasion of the reorganization of the Labor Department, I took the following position in directing a statement to the House committee charged with responsibility in this field. I should like to insert that letter at this point:

APRIL 13, 1950.

Hon WILLIAM L. DAWSON,
Chairman, Commitee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments,
New House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN DAWSON AND MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE: I am writing to you in support of Reorganization Plan No. 6, which is presently being inquired into by your excellent committee during hearings on House Resolution 522. House Resolution 522 has for its objective the rejection of this meritorious reorganization plan.

Reorganization Plan No. 6 in general would accomplish the vesting in the Secretary of Labor of all functions of all other officers of the Department of Labor and all functions of all agencies and employees of that Department. In this fashion the Secretary will have the necessary authority to go hand in hand with the responsibility he presently is charged with in the conduct of his Department.

In your considerations of this proposal, I should like permission to stress three important factors: (a) This plan is identical to what is proposed for the five other executive departments in Reorganization Plan No. 1 through No. 5; (b) it seeks to carry out the recommendations for improvement of the structure of our governmental departments, carefully arrived at in the studies of Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government; (c) it exactly parallels the reorganization of the State and Post Office Departments, recently approved by the Congress, and will result in economy and efficiency through clearer lines of authority and an absence of any division of responsibility.

I urge your support of this proposal of the President, in order to secure the proper foundation and framework for the achievement of the purposes which created this very vital Department.

Respectfully submitted.

NEIL J. LINEHAN,
Member of Congress, Third District, Illinois.

My stand on the National Labor Relations Board, a two-headed agency harboring opposing philosophies, is also a matter of record. The President recently, in removing the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, has taken a very forward step toward curing the internecine strife existing within that agency.

Another landmark measure of the greatest importance to the working people was the congressional enactment of the new and revised minimum-wage law increasing the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour. This meritorious law is contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act. Further labor legislation clarified overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and outlawed retroactive claims. This raising of the minimum wage was one of the Democratic administration's promises in the 1948 campaign.

AGRICULTURE

The following measures were enacted in this field. A Federal tax on oleomargarine was repealed. The Congress recognized the feasibility of continuing farm-price supports for cotton, wheat, corn, rice, tobacco, and peanuts. The 1950 potato crop support was rendered subject to producers agreement on marketing quotas.

Government extension of control on imports of wheat, oil, rice, and rice products was added until June 30, 1950.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

This law is of intense interest to us all. The Korean war has touched our lives in many respects; our successful pursuit of peace will require many self denials from all of us. This act provides the President with the discretionary powers for imposing rationing controls; it permits the fixing of price and wage ceilings simultaneously; it provides for requisitioning of buildings, equipment, and materials; it contemplates allocation and assignments of priorities; control of consumer credit and credit on new housing is provided for; it further gives the President the power to make or guarantee production loans and ability to set up machinery for settling war labor disputes.

SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

The existing draft law was by force of this measure, extended to July 9, 1951. Under its provisions the President has the power to call up the National Guard and the Nation's Reserves when he deems such action necessary in the public interest.

OMNIBUS APPROPRIATION ACT FOR 1951

This act provides the money for operating the Federal Government during 1950–51. In former times individual acts were passed for each department and every item of Government expenditure. At the urging of management experts, the Commission on Organization, and the public, Congress this year gave trial to a form of appropriation bill where the over-all cost of government was considered in a single package. This method was employed as an improved means for public examination of Government fiscal needs. Thirty-six billion dollars has been allocated for the normal operation of the Government for the current year. The Korean war has necessitated a supplemental budget of an additional $18,000,000,000.

CONCLUSION

I have sought to set out in brief the worth-while record of the Eighty-first Congress. Out of space considerations, only the leading measures of national and international importance have been stressed in my report. The steps that the Congress has taken since January 1949 have been substantial and have immeasurably contributed to the well-being and security of our people. They stand as a vital force in our pursuit of peace. They mark well our national vigilance. The continuance of liberty, justice, and freedom from western Europe to Korea has been the rich harvest of our efforts for true representation.

The Wisconsin Senatorial Campaign

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Question. Just what is involved in the 1950 Wisconsin senatorial election on Tuesday, November 7?

Answer. A 6-year term in the United States Senate, beginning in January 1951.

Question. What are the basic differences between the Republican candidate for United States Senator—Senator ALEX WILEY—and the Democratic candidate?

Answer. (1) The Republican candidate has 12 years of intensive legislative experience in Washington; the Democratic candidate has none—zero—a complete blank.

(2) The Republican candidate is committed to the free-enterprise system; the Democratic candidate supports various socialistic proposals (e. g., socialized medicine, socialized farming) to alter that system.

(3) The Republican candidate—Senator WILEY—is opposed to appeasement of communism; the Democratic candidate has repeatedly recommended in effect coddling of Reds at home and abroad.

These are a few of the basic differences between the two men.

BADGER PAPERS ENDORSE WILEY

Question. Does Wisconsin's press believe Senator WILEY should be reelected?

Answer. Here's the answer. It comes from a few of the dozens of favorable editorials in Badger papers:

"Senator WILEY has proved his worth in the Senate. He serves Wisconsin well. More important, he serves the Nation as a leader in our National Legislature. He should be returned to the Senate." (Janesville (Wis.) Gazette.)

"Senator ALEXANDER WILEY deserves to be congratulated on his alertness in protecting and advancing the interests of Wisconsin in Washington." (Clintonville (Wis.) Tribune-Gazette.)

"We need men in Congress who will fight for dairying and for that reason we need to send ALEXANDER WILEY back to Washington." (Hillsboro (Wis.) Sentry-Enterprise.)

"It is well that Senator WILEY has so faithfully discharged the duties of his constituents and his country. Would that we had more people so diligently devoted to our way of life." (Brillion (Wis.) News.)

"The necessity of returning Senator WILEY to Washington is as obvious as anything could be. Wisconsin and the Nation need WILEY in the position of leadership to which he has risen.

"The socialistic ventures of Government must be met with men of WILEY's rank and stature in Washington." (La Crosse (Wis.) Tribune.)

Question. What positions does Senator WILEY hold in Washington?

Answer. The Senator is the highest ranking active Republican member on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He is the highest ranking Republican member on the Senate Judiciary Committee. He is a member of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee (which has been probing crooked politics in Chicago and elsewhere.)

Question. What do these committee assignments mean?

Answer. Plenty, folks, as any well-informed citizen will tell you. Here's why. Most of Congress' work is done in committees. If a man has unimportant committee assignments he is not, relatively speaking, in a position to do an effective job. On the other hand, Senator WILEY by virtue of his important committee assignments, is in one of the most powerful positions that a Wisconsin man has ever been in to really help his State. In other words, it is a basic fact that in 102 years of Wisconsin statehood, very few if any Wisconsin legislators have ever held as high positions in the United States Senate as Senator WILEY does. Those are plain, undisputed facts.

Question. Well, assuming all of the present indications were to be reversed, what would be the effect if the Democratic candidate were to win insofar as committee assignments were concerned?

Answer. Assuming such a condition, here's what would happen. Wisconsin would go to the bottom of the list insofar as representation by one Senator is concerned. In other words, any new Senator coming into office would be at the bottom of the roll. He would get the least important committee assignments. He would have to remain in Washington for many years before he was given any position of authority and responsibility. In the meanwhile, he would have to learn the legislative ropes. This takes years and years. Why? Because Government in Washington has become a very complex affair.

Question. Let's turn to legislation. How many bills has Senator WILEY introduced in the present Congress?

Answer. Your senior Senator, ALEX WILEY, has introduced over 80 bills in the Congress alone.

Question. What are some of the most important Wiley bills in this Congress?

Answer. The St. Lawrence seaway bill; the bill to assure adequate income for farmers producing milk for manufactured dairy products; legislation to reduce taxes on necessities like cosmetics, baby powders, household drugs, union dues, etc.; proveteran bills; anti-Communist legislation; a bill for improvement of conditions among Wisconsin Indians.

These and literally dozens of other bills have been introduced by your Senator within these last 2 years.

Question. Have many of Senator WILEY's bills been enacted into law?

Answer. Absolutely yes. Senator WILEY's was one of the first proposals that was ultimately enacted into the famous portal-to-portal law.

Several of Senator WILEY's suggestions for anti-Communist legislation have been enacted into law.

The Senator's proposals for a Foreign Relations Advisory Committee have been adopted.

Legislation for a cheese marketing news service which the Senator had proposed have also been adopted into law.

Small-business legislation which he suggested was adopted.

Question. Does Senator WILEY have sufficient background in Wisconsin affairs to merit another term in the United States Senate?

Answer. Well, let the record speak for itself. Here are the facts without embellishment. The Senator has one of the most varied backgrounds of any Wisconsin candidate. He has been an attorney, a small-town banker, owner of a dairy farm for over 34 years. At the start of his career he worked in the sawmills of northern Wisconsin for 15 cents an hour, 11 hours a day. He sold life insurance, books, washed dishes to work his way through college. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin.

Question. Is the Senator a family man?

Answer. Yes. He has a family of four children—all born and raised in Wisconsin—and eight grandchildren.

Question. Does he occupy an important position in foreign policy?

Answer. You can answer that one yourself by looking at these facts. Three times Senator WILEY has represented the United States Government in foreign conferences. Moreover, in Washington, D. C., although President Truman has tried to purge him, it is a fact that the President has called him to the White House to confer with him on many critical occasions. In other words, we see the complete contradiction in the Democrats' position. On the one hand they are trying to purge the Senator, and on the other hand they have consulted with him in Washington in the White House itself on crucial foreign policy matters.

Question. Speaking again of foreign policy, what is the Senator's stand?

Answer. The Senator has supported every last bipartisan foreign policy move to curb the tide of communism. In other words, he has voted for all measures designed to strengthen liberty-loving foreign nations in their opposition to the Red tide.

The Senator has, however, opposed the blundering, bungling policy in the Far East, the policy which lost us China, the policy which brought on the Korean war, with over 20,000 American casualties already. He urged from the very first day of the fighting that the United Nations supply more troops and arms rather than rely on Uncle Sam to do everything and to bear all the sacrifices.

The Senator opposed military unpreparedness. He has fought for adequate arms and equipment for American boys.

He has pointed out that Congress voted every last cent which the President requested—over $50,000,000,000 in 4 years—and yet the Democrats still left us unprepared.

The Senator's primary aim has been to prevent another disastrous world war. He has voiced the prayers in the hearts of all Wisconsin people for peace. As a matter of fact, he has introduced legislation for the establishment of a Cabinet Department of Peace in the United States Government.

SENATOR WILEY'S MOVIE AVAILABLE FOR YOUR CLUB

Question. Does Senator WILEY have close contact with the people of Wisconsin?

Answer. Absolutely. Look, folks, at the record. The Senator has visited Wisconsin as often as he could. Often he has flown back to Washington staying up all night—going without sleep for 30 hours—in order to both fulfill his obligations in Wisconsin and in our Nation's Capitol. He prepares weekly news letters, articles, special bulletins.

He produced a precedent-making motion-picture film with sound entitled "America in Crisis." It is a 16-millimeter, 22-minute educational movie which is now being shown throughout Wisconsin. You can borrow a print of that movie by writing to his Washington office. A reel will be sent out to your organization at any date you specify if it is available.

This film is designed to present some of the basic problems in current American life.

HOW BADGER VOTERS HAVE SUPPORTED SENATORS

Question. Does the Republican Party support Senator WILEY as their candidate?

Answer. Absolutely. The Senator was endorsed unanimously at the Republican convention in Milwaukee in June. In the September 19 primary, Senator WILEY completely swamped his opponent. As a matter of fact, the Senator received more votes than were received by his combined opposition—by all four Democratic candidates for the United States Senate.

TYPE OF INDIVIDUAL OPPOSED TO THE SENATOR

Question. Who are the groups opposed to Senator WILEY?

Answer. The answer to this question is very important to Wisconsin because it is a fact, as newspapers have pointed out, that the very groups which oppose the Senator show how important it is that he be reelected.

1. He is opposed by a few big city labor bosses (not by the rank and file worker). These bosses oppose him because he has steadily supported sound labor laws. They have opposed him because he refused to take their orders and refused to repeal fair labor legislation. As a matter of fact, they tried so hard to defeat him that they pumped thousands upon thousands of dollars into an opposition candidate in the Democratic primary—a candidate who was completely defeated by their own party. In other words, the rank and file of honest workers did not swallow the line of their dictatorial labor bosses.

2. Another group which does not like Senator WILEY, is the New Deal socialistic group. They want to completely socialize our country whereas Senator WILEY is 100-percent opposed to socialism. That is why they support the Democratic candidate for United States Senator, a candidate who wants socialized farming and socialized medicine, a candidate as radical as is running anywhere in our country.

3. Various underworld influences are also at work against the Senator. Why? Because they know he is fighting for clean government. He is a member of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee. He has battled against corruption, against crooked politics, against the combined influence of dope peddlers, white slavers, gunmen, cutthroats. Wisconsin is a clean State, and Senator WILEY intends to keep it clean, to keep out the influence of the Chicago mob which years ago infested Wisconsin.

SENATOR'S PRO-MADISON BILLS

Question. What particular bills has Senator WILEY introduced that are of special interest to Madison, the capital of Wisconsin?

Answer. The best answer to that is shown in the Senator's continuous amendments—practically every year—for the great Forest Products Laboratory at Madison. Look in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and you will find that year after year, it has been Senator WILEY's amendments which have saved this great research institution.

Senator WILEY has also helped Madison by seeking to get the Quartermaster Research Laboratory set up there also. The Senator has, in addition, fought for Wisconsin Central Airlines whose headquarters is at Madison.

If you look again at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, you will note that time after time, the Senator has spotlighted the great role of the University of Wisconsin. He has pointed out that this famed university of which every Wisconsinite is proud, has been in the forefront of social and scientific progress. Time and again, Senator WILEY has publicly praised in the Senate the great faculty and student body of the university as well as the beautiful city in which it is located.

Question. Can you cite any instances wherein Senator WILEY has been of particular help to the consumer?

Answer. The best illustration of this point came up when the notorious natural-gas-rate-increase bill was being debated in the Senate. This is the unsound bill which was sponsored by leading Democrats. But its aim was to cause an increase in the rates paid by 1,500,000 Wisconsin users of natural gas.

Senator WILEY denounced the bill as inflationary and as a terrible blow to the consumers of the State. He voted against it and moreover urged the President to veto the bill when the Democratic Congress unfortunately passed it. Finally, after a long fight, the President gave into Republican pressure and vetoed the dangerous bill. That shows how Senator WILEY has fought to protect the consumer. Innumerable Wisconsin newspapers applauded the Senator's efforts on this particular issue.

SENATOR WILEY RECEIVED TWO VETERANS' AWARDS

Question. What has the Senator done for Wisconsin veterans?

Answer. Here is the easy answer to that one:

1. The Senator was one of the original cosponsors of the famous GI bill of rights.

2. Through the years, he has introduced legislation endorsed by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and American Veterans of World War II.

3. The Senator was given special awards by both the AMVETS and Disabled American Veterans Foundation.

4. He has introduced a long series of bills for other veteran groups including the Military Order of the Purple Heart and Reserve Officers' Association of the United States.

Question. What sort of work record has Senator WILEY compiled?

Answer. The best answer to that is shown by an editorial carried in the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald. This editorial stated:

"Senator WILEY works hard. He personally reported out 205 bills last season, more than any other man in the House or Senate."

Question. What is the basic question that the average voter should ask himself in going to the polls?

Answer. The only real question that counts is this: "Do I want a man of experience like Senator WILEY, who is dedicated to the free-enterprise system, or do I want a man of complete inexperience who is opposed to that free-enterprise system?"

Question. Has Senator WILEY been a friend of the Wisconsin farm industry which is the backbone of Wisconsin's economy?

Answer. Absolutely. His efforts for farmers have been endorsed by the National Grange, by famous magazines like Hoard's Dairyman, by innumerable Wisconsin cooperatives, REA's, and other groups. In fact the Senator is known as a spokesman for the Wisconsin dairy industry in the Halls of Congress.

BILLS IN THE INTEREST OF WOMEN

Question. Has Senator WILEY introduced legislation of particular interest to women?

Answer. Absolutely yes. He is one of the leading cosponsors of the women's equal rights amendment. Moreover, he has been one of the leading fighters for legislation to wipe out nuisance excise taxes on cosmetics, baby powders, and essential drugs that every family uses in its medicine chest.

Question. What has Senator WILEY done for the great conservation movement of Wisconsin?

Answer. He has introduced innumerable pieces of legislation endorsed by the Izaak Walton League and by countless rod and gun clubs. He has been a vigorous supporter of legislation for Federal aid to fish hatcheries and for Federal aid for forest preservation and conservation of our national parks.

HELP GIVEN TO BADGER TOURIST INDUSTRY

Question. What has Senator WILEY done for the great Wisconsin tourist industry which is the second most important industry in the State in furnishing income?

Answer. The Senator has been termed in the press one of Wisconsin's best salesmen in the Nation. Time after time he has focused the attention of our country on Wisconsin as a tourist paradise. The favorable publicity which he has secured for Wisconsin has helped contribute to the economic health of the great tourist industry of the State. This means many more dollars and cents to managers and workers in restaurants, hotels, tourist cabins, gasoline stations, and other service industries.

Question. What does my vote for Senator WILEY mean?

Answer. Your favorable vote means that you believe in:

1. Keeping a man of experience in Washington.

2. Retaining a leader who believes in honest, clean government, who is a sworn enemy of crime and corruption.

3. Supporting a man who wants to conserve your tax funds rather than to spend them irresponsibly.

4. Supporting a man whose integrity has never been questioned even by his opponents.

5. Supporting a man who believes in the people and has faith in the people, who tries to serve the people rather than to take the dictates of any special-interest group.

CONCLUSION

Well, folks, that concludes this "Information, please" quiz. I've tried to present these answers candidly and fairly. I'm not asking for any special credit or pats on the back. All I've sought to do is to report to you honestly and objectively on the facts. I've always sought to do the best I know how, admitting errors when they occur and trying constantly to do a better job for you.

You, the voter, can exercise your own fine judgment and wisdom in making up your mind.

I have faith in your support.

Don't forget, friends, Tuesday, November 7, is a crucial day for Wisconsin.

Not only is the senatorship at stake but the governorship, county, and local officers. I feel that the Republican ticket merits your kind support right down the line—ALEX WILEY, Walter Kohler, Jr., and all our other Republican candidates.

We want to keep Wisconsin free, sound, prosperous—with good government at Madison and strong Republican leadership in Washington.

So, folks, I'll be seeing you at the polls Tuesday, November 7.

Please vote for good government, for peace (rather than 3 Democratic wars in 33 years), for economical, responsible government (rather than Democratic waste and extravagance).

Thanks very much, indeed, folks.

Unfinished Tax Problems

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Unfinished Tax Problems delivered by me over the radio program entitled "Pro and Con" over facilities of the National Broadcasting Co., Friday, October 6, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ordinarily higher taxes are not a very pleasant subject to talk about because most people don't want to pay more taxes. That is natural, and I don't blame them.

However, today I am particularly glad of the chance to talk about taxes because it is through our taxes that we all must make a concrete contribution toward winning a victory in the Korean fighting and toward strengthening our country.

The brunt of the sacrifice in all wars has always been carried by a comparatively small group—those actually under fire or those at the combat front primarily. That is just as true of the fighting in Korea as of any other war. According to the last tabulation 2,441 young men have been killed in action or died of wounds and about 15,000 others are wounded or missing—perhaps captured—perhaps dead.

Those men have alreay paid a great deal more than taxes. So have the others who have been in the front lines. Even those who have been lucky enough to escape injury so far.

Our job at home is to supply the money and the implements of war for these men to fight with and for our Armed Forces to guard us with after the fighting in Korea comes to an end. That means as a starter higher taxes—perhaps sharply higher taxes.

Many of you know that Congress just passed a tax bill a few days ago. Perhaps you will be interested in some of the provisions. The principal provisions are increases in the rates of taxes on the incomes of both individuals and corporations.

For example, for most people the rate will go up from about 17 percent to 20 percent of your income above exemptions and deductions. That is on the first bracket. On the highest bracket—those with very large incomes—the rate will go up to over 90 percent—more than nine-tenths of the income of those drawing very big salaries.

The tax rate on corporation incomes goes up from 38 percent to 45 percent. In other words all corporations except the very small ones will have to turn over almost half their income to the Federal Government.

I realize that these tax increases, particularly those on the average man with a family to support, may not be easy to pay in some cases. Congress decided to put them on with real reluctance, I can tell you. There was just no other way to begin to raise enough revenue to meet this situation.

Furthermore, I must tell you that these taxes are possibly only the beginning. I wish I could tell you that further tax increases will not be necessary but that is not the case. We want to pay as we go on this rearmament program if we possibly can. World War II was paid for largely by borrowing but that created inflation and a higher cost of living and a very great hardship for millions of people. If the Government can raise enough revenue through taxes to meet its expenses without borrowing, it will be possible to keep prices from going up any further. That is one of the most important reasons for raising taxes.

In practice taxes heavy enough to pay the full cost of rearming ourselves and making our country secure would be extremely burdensome. They would be very difficult to pay. It will be a really big problem to find ways and means of raising enough money for the Government to meet this situation without laying an absolutely intolerable burden on taxpayers which means everybody—wage earners, farmers, salaried people, businessmen, everybody. That is a problem that Congress is going to have to tackle as soon as it goes back into session again.

Is there any way by which these extremely heavy taxes can be avoided? I don't know but I can suggest some ideas we might try. For example, we ought to start in immediately in cutting out or slashing to the bone some of the less essential activities of our Government. Taxpayers are going to be forced to cut down their own expenses when more taxes are withheld from their wages and salaries. Many taxpayers are going to have to do without things they really need or postpone plans they have made.

There is no reason on earth why the Federal Government should not do precisely the same thing with some of its functions that are not really essential. Everyone knows that Federal spending for nonessential purposes could be cut down sharply. Even before the fighting in Korea started, the Federal Government was spending five times as much as it did back in 1940 and 1941. There is no possible reason why the Federal Government should expect to continue spending as usual while each individual taxpayer is forced to give up his own plan so that he can give more of his income to the Government.

In my judgment it should be equally possible to cut out four or five billion dollars of Federal spending per year. Senator HARRY BYRD, of Virginia, has proposed budget reduction of about that amount. He is a Democrat and I am a Republican but this matter is far too serious for partisanship. I go along with him 100 percent in his proposal for budget reduction. He and I teamed up to put through the single-package Federal appropriation bill which helped us save over half a billion dollars on this year's budget, and I believe that if economy-minded Republicans and Democrats alike will work together, we can make really big savings in Federal spending.

If we could save $5,000,000,000 in nondefense spending, that $5,000,000,000 would be available for building up our military strength. We will need ever cent we can get.

If we are willing to face up to this problem squarely, it should not be too hard to find places where real savings can be made. We may have to do without new post offices and the like for a while—perhaps for some years. We ought to examine into some of the subsidies paid out by the Federal Government—particularly the hidden subsidies which seem to leak out of every bureau and agency in the Government. Some of those subsidies have been going on far too long as it is, and it is time they put a stop to them. We simply cannot afford such luxuries any longer.

No matter how much we save on these nonessential functions the cost of rearming ourselves is sure to take heavier taxes than we have had in the past. Wars and the munitions of war are terribly expensive. That is why it is all the more important to make every dollar count.

But to return to the subject of taxes again, a number of people have asked me what Congress did about an excess-profits tax. Many people seem to be under the impression that Congress decided not to levy a tax on excess profits during the late session. That is not quite correct.

During consideration of the tax bill that was just enacted Congress decided fairly definitely that there would be an excess-profits tax and that it would become effective on the same date as the higher individual income taxes or perhaps on an earlier date That decision in general terms was written into the law.

However, we ran into some difficulty in determining exactly how the tax should be levied. The Treasury Department which normally performs the detailed studies as a basis for recommendations on how the tax should be levied informed Congress that it was not in position to recommend the exact form that the excess-profits tax should take. Apparently the Treasury tax experts were caught off balance by this emergency. They had not tried to work out the details or to draft the precise legal language for an excess-profits tax. Both the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Snyder, and President Truman definitely recommended to Congress that we wait until the problem had been studied very carefully before deciding exactly what form an excess-profits tax should take.

When these details have been worked out, the excess-profits tax is supposed to be dated back at least to the date on which the individual tax increases go into effect.

An excess-profits tax or war-profits tax is a very complicated type of tax for the Treasury to administer. There are still thousands of cases left over from the excess-profits tax of World War II which have not been settled yet. The reason it is so difficult to apply is that it is not so much a tax as a method of confiscation. The general idea of a war-profits tax is, practically speaking, to confiscate the profits that arise out of war. In other words, it is supposed to take the profits out of war by taxing them into the Treasury of the United States.

That is easier said than done. Although the rates of the World War II excess-profits tax approached 100 percent, there were still somehow some persons who managed to find loopholes in the law or by some other means to make a good deal of money out of the war. We all know that. Furthermore, when you talk about confiscating war profits you want to be sure of just what you are confiscating. Generally you don't want to confiscate normal regular profits. They are taxable at the regular rate of 45 percent as I said before, but they should not be confiscated if they are not war profits. Unless the tax laws are very carefully written we may find that it has been written so as to apply excess-profit rates against companies which are really making only normal average incomes.

That is why both the Treasury and the President urged Congress to wait awhile before working out the exact details of an excess-profits tax law. That is what was done.

Even when an excess-profits tax is put into effect, however, I should warn you that it will not solve all of our tax problems. I am afraid many people have an exaggerated idea of the amount of money that can be brought to the Treasury through an excess-profits tax. An excess-profits tax might possibly raise three or four or five billion dollars a year. It is hard to tell. Even if it does so, however, that will probably not be enough to pay the cost of providing us with the planes, tanks, and guns, and other equipment that we must have in order to be really secure. Even if every dollar of war profits can be taken into the Treasury it is not likely to be enough to pay the cost of rearmament.

That is why it is so absolutely essential to cut back on every unnecessary item of cost in the Federal Government. That is why it may be necessary for Congress to search for additional ways of raising revenue. In levying any such additional taxes I intend to do my best to see that they are levied as fairly as possible so that no one is required to pay more than his share. But I do believe everyone should be willing to pay this share. I believe that is the least we can do to back up the men and boys who are fighting for us in Korea. If all of us understand that I believe we will all be willing to do our part.

A Letter Describing Early-Day Conditions in Idaho

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, for the information of my colleagues there is inserted herewith a letter describing early-day conditions in northern Idaho:

OCTOBER 9, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND EBY: Your letter of September 23 making an analysis of the plans of storing water on Lake Pend Oreille and generating power through the construction of the Albeni Falls Dam brings to my mind my experiences and observations concerning the Clark Fork River and Lake Pend Oreille since we, the White family, the mother and five children, got off the Northern Pacific train at the new depot built in the lane cut through the tall timber for the railroad's right-of-way July 30, 1890.

There weren't too many people for the White family to see in Clark Fork in those days, nothing much but Chinese coolies wearing a queue under a big umbrella hat, living in little huts in the woods along the railroad, cutting wood to fire the locomotives before coal was discovered at Roslyn in the Cascades. These Chinese, and I think there were over a hundred of them, were cutting wood and shingle bolts for the water-power shingle mills. We found them queer people that couldn't understand or speak English.

I have learned a lot about Lake Pend Oreille and the Clark Fork River since those eventful days when I was a 13-year-old boy. We were living in the railway depot then the very next day after our arrival, the other two kids in town insisted that I go way back in the woods to the foot of Antelope Mountain to see the mine—where there were some log cabins, a tunnel on the hillside, a boxed-in ore chute from the dump down to a log ore bin at the foot of the hill—all idle and vacant. The story was that the foreman got the check for the returns from the first ore shipment that was made that spring (1890) and skipped, leaving the men without any pay. This is now the Lawrence mine on Antelope Mountain.

There were a good many prospectors in Clark Fork in those days, baching in their miners' cabins scattered over the hills and around the valleys working their claims, before Grover Cleveland called a special session of Congress to repeal the Silver Purchase Act, and struck American mining a blow from which it hasn't recovered to this very good day.

Prospectors, sometimes called sourdoughs of that day, were really honest-to-God men; well read, well informed, and bearded, husky individuals.

My father, being a telegraph operator and railway agent in those days before mining consolidations and big properties were the rule, quite often received messages over the wire which some little broker in Spokane would send out to the fellows working claims in the hills, and when the operators would be authorized to find a messenger to take the telegrams up to the claims, in most cases I was the messenger.

I didn't think much of skipping up a steep trail almost to the top of the main range, or climbing the foothills around Clark Fork in those days; and I was very much intrigued by the pluck and determination of those real Americans that hammered away with their single jacks at the steel-defying rock, with drills sharpened with charcoal burned from the neighboring timber. The muck from the headings of their tunnel was trammed out in home-made cars made of boards and wooden wheels with treads covered with rawhide, on tracks made of square poles covered with strap iron.

I watched these sturdy prospectors sinking their shafts by hand to reach the ore and the fortunes they were sure was waiting to be opened in the deeper levels of these veins, hoisting their muck in iron-bound buckets with home-made windlass which they wound up by hand with muscle and brawn in 10-hour shifts.

Then came Grover Cleveland with the repeal of the Silver Purchase Act and a financial depression that did its work. The big mines shut down all over the country and our prospectors scattered to other camps and other occupations. Their tunnels and shafts stand today as a monument to perseverance and hard labor and American ideals that our bureaus here in Washington are endeavoring to extinguish.

But now coming back to the Clark Fork River and Lake Pend Oreille. My father, being a southerner with an appreciation for land values and needing a home, took up a homestead in the woods just off the railroad's right-of-way and in a southern fashion built our house on blocks 2 feet off the ground.

In the year 1894 came the flood, covering our yard and gradually rising until it was necessary for us to take our bedding and cooking utensils and ferry to the higher ground to escape the flood that raised to 18 inches above the floor of our house setting on its 2-foot blocks. Boxcars that came through on trains from Portland showed the high water marks up to the eaves.

Those were stirring and interesting days for the White family at Clark Fork.

The things being said at this late date by the Army engineers and yourself concerning the quality and nature of the land in the Clark Fork Valley could have been said of either the delta of the Rio Grande or the delta of the Colorado River which have been cleared up and put into production and have proved to lie some of the most fertile and productive land on earth. Some of the most fertile land in Idaho lies in the delta of the Clark Fork River above Lake Pend Oreille. My 60 years of observation and experience convinces me of this fact.

This land in the Clark Fork Delta has not been flooded for 20 years until the high waters of 2 years ago.

Canary grass grows a forage higher than your head on the land in the Clark Fork Delta; and besides clover, timothy, and redtop grass grows luxuriantly on the meadows in the Clark Fork Valley and Delta.

Beef cattle come off these meadows in the fall rolling fat. Now what more do you want and where can you find land that is more profitable to own and utilize?

There is another feature of this land that probably you, with your keen observation, may have overlooked. In the autumn when the frost strikes or kills off the crops and grass on the higher farm lands, in the Clark Fork Valley there is a mist or fog which rises from the warm waters of the Clark Fork

River and spreads over these lowlands and keeps off the frost for a period of sometimes from 6 weeks to 2 months later than the frost period in the upper elevations; and the cattle get fat on the late pasture.

Now with respect to the influence of the local utility that is buying Bonneville power for 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour and selling it to the mines at 1¼ cents per kilowatt-hour, it is proposed to ruin the Clark Fork Valley and the low-lying lands around Lake Pend Oreille and the Pend Oreille River by the storage of water and the power to be generated over a dam at Albeni Falls that will doubtless be all bought by the local water power company and turned into its distributing system through the transformer station and transmission lines built at Newport overlooking the site of the proposed new plant, which at the present prices should earn the Spokane company the difference between purchase and selling price of $2,000,000 a year.

Show me a mine in the State of Idaho or anywhere else that would produce $2,000,000 a year income.

Talk about a gold mine, if the power companies can induce the Government to come in and shoulder the expense of paying for the damage to the land and paying for the construction of a plant and deliver the power to it at 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour, what more could our Government do for any business organization anywhere?

It is always a pleasure to receive your letters and pithy comments, and I hope that you and I will live to see the day when the vein structure and ore deposits of the Clark Fork district will be explored at depths and the dreams of the old miners that worked so industriously and persistently in the early nineties will come true.

Best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Sources of Failure of the Veto Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the New York Times of September 26, 1950, by Arthur Krock.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOURCES OF FAILURE OF THE VETO MESSAGE

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, September 25.—There were a number of reasons why Congress overrode the President's veto of the new Communist control law, and overrode it by far more than the two-thirds majorities required by the Constitution. One was that the constituencies revealed an overwhelming demand for legislation of this nature before Congress recessed, and the bill which emerged from the trading and compromising that is always the price of highly controversial measures was well known to be the only one possible in the time that remained.

But in view of the forcefulness of the veto message and the circumstance that the delaying action by the handful of Senators opposed to the bill assured enough time for the country to read the message before the Senate voted, it is plain that other and worthier considerations influenced the size and personnel of the vote to override and were responsible also for the breach in the administration front represented by some of the overriders. Only this could explain the presence in the prevailing group of the majority leader, Mr. LUCAS; the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. CONNALLY; Senators HILL, MCMAHON, and TYDINGS, who have carried many burdens for the President; and on the Republican side, Senators IVES, SALTONSTALL, and SMITH of Maine.

Among these latter considerations were the following:

1. For many years the executive departments, under two Democratic Presidents, were, to say the least, lax in keeping subversives out of the country and out of the Government, and this has been dramatically demonstrated. The administration fight against H. R. 9490 in the name of protecting civil liberties under the Constitution would have carried more weight if this had not been true.

2. Some of the most violent protests against the bill came from quarters which have kept company with groups that have been sympathetic with Soviet policies and activities in this country, and some came from officeholders who have acquired their places through the support of such groups. This helped to cancel out the sincere and documented objections of patriotic citizens and newspapers concerned over the integrity of the Bill of Rights.

THE FACTUAL DISPUTE

3. But even these considerations do not account for the size of the overriding majority and the identities of some who helped to compose it. That can be traced partly to the fact that the President, in his veto message, stated as incontrovertible truths things which were as firmly controverted by members who helped to write the bill. (The rest of the message was given over to opinions of how the measure would operate, and in matters of opinion there is always the right to differ.)

After the President sent his message Friday, and the delaying action began, Senators in favor of the bill drew up specific challenges of his statements of fact concerning the measure and spread them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The following is a sample of the response of Messrs. FERGUSON and MUNDT, Republicans:

The President says "it would aid potential enemies by requiring the publication of a complete list of vital defense plants, laboratories, and other installations." * * * The fact is, as emphasized in the report of the conferees, that the test to be applied by the Secretary of Defense in publishing any list of facilities is that he "finds and determines that the security of the United States requires the application of the provisions of subsection A of this section." Obviously, then, if publication would be against the interest of national security, as the President claims, the Secretary could make no such designations or postings. It may be added that if the subsection is made inoperative by a failure of the Secretary, for security or other reasons, to designate an establishment as a defense facility and so publish the fact, nothing anywhere in the act modifies the protection afforded those establishments by other provisions of the criminal code, including the espionage and sabotage statutes.

ON "THOUGHT-CONTROL"

Another example:

The President says, "It would put the Government * * * in the thought-control business." Neither any person in the course of the entire debate on this legislation, nor the President in his veto message, has been able to point to a word or phrase in those sections of the bill which the President finds so objectionable, that suggests or implies thought-control. The actual fact is that the legislation of which the President speaks proscribes and punishes only specific, designated overt acts which are clearly defined in the law.

And Senator MCCARRAN, Democrat, in a separate analysis of the veto message, cited the text of the bill against other criticisms which the President classified as facts.

This type of counterattack fortified many who found the force of the veto disturbing. The result was that, for various reasons, only seven Senators were unrecorded on final passage—BENTON, DOWNEY, FLANDERS, GILLETTE, MORSE, PEPPER, and WITHERS; and 77 Senators voted either to override, or were paired in favor, as against 12 who voted, or were paired, to sustain.

Summary of Housing Legislation Enacted by Second Session of Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D. C., September 27, 1950.

Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCCORMACK: At Mr. Foley's request, I am sending to you with this note a brief summary of housing legislation enacted by the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. This, of course, is in addition to the Housing Act of 1949 which was enacted by the first session of the Eighty-first Congress providing for (1) a declaration of national housing policy, (2) Federal assistance to local communities for slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects, (3) Federal assistance to local communities for low-rent public housing for families of low income now living in slums and other inadequate housing, (4) a program of housing research and (5) loans and grants to farmers who otherwise would be unable to obtain credit for housing on reasonable terms within their ability to pay.

Sincerely yours,

B. T. FITZPATRICK,
Deputy Administrator and General Counsel.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF HOUSING LEGISLATION ENACTED INTO LAW IN 1950 (81ST CONG.)

1. HOUSING ACT OF 1950 (PUBLIC LAW 475, APPROVED APRIL 20, 1950)

A. FHA (note greater down payments are now being required as part of inflation control—see item 4)

New FHA Low-Cost Home Program

The Housing Act of 1950 added a new section 8 to the National Housing Act providing a new FHA mortgage-insurance program for low-cost homes in suburban and outlying areas. This program replaces the former class 3 FHA loans. The section 8 authorization is limited to $250,000,000.

FHA Insurance of Modernization and Repair Loans Continued

The FHA title I authorization to insure lenders against losses on home modernization and repair loans was extended to July 1, 1955. A new formula was provided which limits the total amount of such outstanding insured loans to $1,2050,000,000. This amounts to an increase in authorization of approximately $5,000,000.

FHA Title II Home Mortgage Insurance Program Improved

The FHA title II home mortgage insurance authorization was increased by $2,250,000,000 to a total authorization of not more than $9,000,000,000, and the program was revised to stimulate more lower-cost homes of a size adequate for family life.

The section 207 FHA rental-housing mortgage-insurance program was amended to continue the stimulation of rental-housing construction formerly provided by the temporary section 608 rental-housing program. Provisions were added to section 207 requiring certification by the mortgagor that there will be no discrimination in the selection of tenants by reason of the fact that there are children in the families.

FHA Cooperative Housing Mortgage Insurance Liberalized

New provisions were added to the National Housing Act liberalizing the FHA program of mortgage insurance for projects of housing cooperatives. The act required the appointment of a new Assistant Commissioner of FHA to administer cooperative housing mortgage insurance, and to furnish technical advice and assistance to such housing.

Temporary Section 608 FHA Rental-Housing Program

An increase of $500,000,000 in the mortgage insurance authority under section 608 of the National Housing Act was provided in order that applications for section 608 mortgage insurance on rental housing received in the FHA field offices on or before March 1, 1950, might be processed. (Sec. 608 authority was temporary and no more applications can be processed under that section.)

FHA Mortgage Insurance for War-Housing Sales Provided

Section 610 of the National Housing Act was amended to make mortgage insurance in connection with the sale of war housing by the Government or any public-housing agency applicable also to the sale of war housing constructed under Public Law 671, Seventy-sixth Congress.

FHA Insurance of Loans for Manufactured Houses and Large-Scale Site Construction Liberalized

The FHA mortgage insurance authorization was liberalized covering insurance of loans to finance the manufacture of houses and to finance large-scale modernized site construction of housing.

B. GI home-loan guaranty increased—Direct loans to veterans provided

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 was amended by raising the maximum maturity of GI loans from 25 to 30 years; by raising the maximum home-loan guaranty from $4,000, or 50 percent of the loan, to $7,500, or 60 percent of the loan; to require all homes financed by GI home loans to meet construction requirements prescribed by the Veterans' Administration; to abolish combination VA-FHA loans effective December 31, 1950; and to provide for stand-by direct home loans to veterans unable to obtain loans under the terms of the act from private sources.

C. Disposal of war and veterans' housing facilitated

The Housing Act of 1950 provided for the disposition of all war and veterans' housing under the jurisdiction of the Housing and Home Finance Agency and for the transfer of the farm-labor camps under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture to the Public Housing Administration for management and disposal. (Program being reexamined due to Korean situation.)

D. Loans for student and faculty housing authorized

The Housing and Home Finance Administration was authorized to make loans to educational institutions of higher learning for the construction of housing for their students and faculties. To provide funds for the loans the Administrator was authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time obligations for purchase by the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $300,000,000. (Program temporarily suspended due to Korean situation.)

E. Home mortgage secondary market operations implemented

An additional authorization of $250,000,000 was provided to the Federal National Mortgage Association for the purchase of home mortgages. The new section 8 FHA home mortgages were made eligible for purchase by the Federal National Mortgage Association. The Veterans' Administration guaranteed farm-home mortgages were added to the home mortgages exempted from the 50 percent limitation on the amount of eligible mortgages in a lender's portfolio which may be sold to the association.

2. MILITARY HOUSING MORTGAGE INSURANCE PROGRAM ASSISTED

Public Law 498, approved May 2, 1950, amended title VIII of the National Housing Act, which authorizes FHA mortgage insurance for rental housing at or in areas adjacent to military installations. The amendment permitted the military services to employ architects to draft plans for military housing projects. Upon the basis of these plans and specifications prospective sponsors of projects bid competitively for the privilege of supplying the housing so that the necessity of each prospective sponsor preparing separate plans and specifications is eliminated, thus expediting and encouraging the provision of military housing by private enterprise.

3. ADMINISTRATION OF HOUSING AND COMMUNITY FACILITY PROGRAMS FURTHER COORDINATED

Three reorganization plans were put into effect which further coordinated the housing and community facilities functions and activities of the Federal Government into the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Reorganization Plan No. 17 (effective May 24, 1950) transferred two programs from the General Services Administration to the Housing and Home Finance Agency: (1) Administration of advances to State and local governments for the planning of public works; and (2) management and disposal of sewers, schools, hospitals, and other community facilities constructed under title II of the Lanham Act, the World War II War Housing Act.

Reorganization Plan No. 22 (effective September 7, 1950) transferred the Federal National Mortgage Association to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. The Association provides a secondary market for home mortgages insured or guaranteed by Federal Government agencies through the purchase, service, and sale of such mortgages. In addition, it is authorized to make direct loans for housing in Alaska.

Reorganization Plan No. 23 (effective September 7, 1950) transferred from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency the lending functions of the Government with respect to the production and distribution of prefabricated houses and components.

4. HOUSING INFLATION CONTROLS—CONSERVATION OF CONSTRUCTION MATERIALS FOR DEFENSE PURPOSES

The Defense Production Act of 1950, Public Law 774, approved September 8, 1950, authorized the control of real-estate credit in order to conserve materials for defense use and to protect the national economy against inflation. The act provides that regulations may be prescribed governing maximum loan or credit values, minimum down payments, and trade-in values, as well as the amount, form, and time of various payments involving real-estate credit. The President had previously (on July 18, 1950) issued administrative instructions to Government agencies requesting certain curtailments of housing credit extended by them in order to assist in curbing inflation and to conserve materials for national defense purposes. Credit controls on Government-aided housing (old or new houses financed with the aid of FHA, VA, etc.) are to be administered by the Housing and Home Finance Agency, and controls on new construction the financing of which is not aided by Government agencies are to be administered by the Federal Reserve Board in consultation with the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

The act provides for priority and allocation powers which are designed to conserve materials for defense purposes. The hoarding of scarce materials (including building materials) may be prohibited. The first regulation issued under the act by the new National Production Authority designates cement, gypsum board, sheathing, lath, and various iron and steel products as scarce materials. The act will not only assure conservation of materials for defense purposes but, if it becomes necessary, will be used to allocate available materials for the most essential housing purposes, such as housing for military personnel and war workers, and lower cost housing.

5. SAVINGS AND LOAN INDUSTRY STRENGTHENED

Public Law 576, approved June 27, 1950, contained provisions designed to strengthen the savings and loan industry, thus further aiding in the financing of homes and the encouragement of savings.

The act requires lending institutions which are members of Federal home loan banks (principally savings and loan associations) to maintain a certain minimum liquidity. In order to assure a source of funds to savings and loan associations to meet demands upon them for mortgage funds and to meet withdrawal requests by savers and account holders, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase the obligation of Federal home loan banks up to $1,000,000,000. The proceeds of these obligations would be used for advances by the banks to savings and loan associations and other members of the Federal home loan banks.

The insurance protection afforded by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to the accounts of savers in savings and loan associations is increased from $5,000 to $10,000 for each account. It was provided that the increase would go into effect when a corresponding increase had been authorized in the insurance coverage of other banks deposits by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Legislation was approved by the President on September 21 authorizing this increase. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is also authorized by Public Law 576 to borrow from the Treasury such funds as in the judgment of the Home Loan Bank Board are required for insurance purposes.

The act also accelerates retirement of the Government-owned capital stock in the Federal home loan banks and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

6. TERRITORIES ENABLED TO UNDERTAKE SLUM CLEARANCE AND URBAN REDEVELOPMENT

The Territorial Enabling Act of 1950 enabled the governments of Puerto Rico, Alaska, Hawaii, and the Virgin Islands to authorize public bodies or agencies to undertake slum clearance and urban redevelopment activities. The low-rent public housing enabling statutes of Puerto Rico, Alaska, and Hawaii were revised to assist that program in those territories.

7. RENT CONTROL CONTINUED

Public Law 574, approved June 23, 1950, continued rent control until December 31, 1950, except where local governments adopt resolutions requiring the continuance of rent control. In such instances rent control will cease June 30, 1951. The act also provides that rent control shall be terminated in localities where the local governing body adopts a resolution, after public hearing, that the shortage of housing is no longer such as to require rent control in that community.

8. CRIMINAL STATUTE AMENDED TO PROTECT SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Public Law 634, approved August 3, 1950, amended the criminal provisions of the United States Code to include savings and loan associations within the definition of the word "bank" as used in the provisions of the code with respect to bank robbery and incidental crimes.

SEC. 45.3. Application for visas—Qualifications: (a) An applicant shall have the burden of establishing that he is entitled to the specific classification under which he makes application as well as his eligibility to receive a visa under the general immigration laws and regulations. An applicant shall not be issued an immigration visa if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that such applicant is subject to exclusion from the United States under any provisions of the immigration laws and regulations or (1) is not a displaced person and an eligible displaced person if applying for a visa as such, or (2) is not eligible to receive a visa under any provision of the Displaced Persons Act and the regulations contained in this part.

(b) An applicant who is an eligible displaced person or an eligible displaced orphan for whom assurances have been furnished pursuant to the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act shall not be required to furnish an affidavit, or other evidence, of support. However, if the assurances of employment, housing, or of proper care submitted in behalf of such applicant are deemed by the consular officer to be inadequate for the purposes for which they are submitted, no visa shall be issued to the applicant.

(c) In determining whether an applicant is eligible under the Displaced Persons Act, the certification and report of the Commission, prepared pursuant to section 10 of the Displaced Persons Act, shall be considered by the consular officer as establishing, in the absence of specific knowledge or substantial belief showing ineligibility, that the applicant is eligible under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act, except so far as such report relates to the issuance of a visa under the general immigration laws and regulations. Consular officers shall not be required to reopen or review each case de novo in the absence of specific knowledge or substantial belief showing ineligibility under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act, as distinguished from the question of eligibility to receive a visa under the general immigration laws and regulations. In the event the consular officer has specific knowledge or substantial belief showing ineligibility under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act, an appropriate inquiry shall be instituted to ascertain the facts relative thereto, and, in this connection, the consular officer may interrogate the applicant or any other persons, and may consider any evidence deemed relevant to a determination of the alien's eligibility under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act.

(d) So far as concerns applicants under the provisions of sections 3 (b), 3 (c), and 12 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act who registered with a United States consular officer prior to June 14, 1950, the burden of coming forward to claim eligibility under any of such provisions shall be borne by the applicant, and if such eligibility is established, his priority in the issuance of a visa shall be determined as of his original registration priority.

Sec. 45.4. Preferences and priorities: (a) The preferences and priorities provided within the quotas by the Immigration Act of 1924 and the regulations issued thereunder shall not be applicable in the case of any person receiving an immigration visa pursuant to the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act, except as otherwise expressly provided in this section. In lieu thereof, the following preferences, without priority in time of issuance of visas as between such preferences or as between preference or nonpreference cases under the Displaced Persons Act, shall be granted to persons and their family dependents who are the spouses or the unmarried dependent children under 21 years of age, including adopted children and stepchildren of such persons:

(1) Aliens who are farm, household, construction, clothing, and garment workers and other workers needed in the locality in the United States in which such persons propose to reside, or persons possessing special educational, scientific, technological, or professional qualifications.

(2) Persons who are the blood relatives of citizens or lawfully admitted alien residents of the United States, such relationship in either case being within the third degree of consanguinity computed according to the rules of the common law.

(3) Within the foregoing preference classes priority in the issuance of visas shall be given to eligible displaced persons who during World War II bore arms against the enemies of the United States or who served honorably in the labor service or guard units of the United States Army, and their family dependents who are the spouses or the unmarried dependent children under 21 years of age, including adopted children and stepchildren.

(b) Notwithstanding the preferences established by paragraph (a) of this section, and the preferences authorized by section 6 of the Immigration Act of 1924, top priority in the issuance of immigration visas under the German and Austrian quotas shall be granted to adopted children described in section 45.2 (c) (2). The date of registration for an immigration visa with the United States consular office shall determine the priority among such children in the issuance of visas within the classification. Immigration visas issued pursuant to this paragraph shall be charged to the nonpreference portion of such quotas.

Sec. 45.5. Proceedure in issuing or refusing visas under the Displaced Persons Act: (a) Except as otherwise expressly provided in this part, consular officers shall follow the procedure prescribed in sections 42.317–42.357 of this chapter in issuing immigration visas pursuant to the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act.

(b) Supporting documents required under section 42.327 of this chapter shall be attached to the visa application. Reports required under the provisions of sections 10 and 12 of the Displaced Persons Act with respect to eligible displaced persons and persons of German ethnic origin shall be appended to the visa in such manner as to make them readily available to officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Consular officers shall insist upon presentation of birth certificates if such certificates are reasonably procurable, and in those cases in which the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the alien was not born in the alleged country of birth, the alien shall be required to present satisfactory evidence of his birthplace. In cases where birth or police certificates are not reasonably available, secondary evidence of birthplace, character references, or other probative evidence may be accepted in lieu thereof.

(c) In the case of any applicant who is determined by the Commission to be eligible under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act and who, for any reason, is refused an immigration visa by a consular officer, a report in writing, approved and signed by the consular officer in charge shall be submitted to the Commission for the purpose of maintaining orderly records, which report shall show the cause for rejection of the applicant and shall contain a reference to the specific provision or provisions of law on which such rejection is based. In any such case the consular officer shall notify the appropriate field representative of the Commission of the action taken.

(d) No quota immigration visa shall be issued under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act or the regulations promulgated pursuant thereto until the visa-issuing officer shall have received an appropriate quota number for such purpose.

(e) Nonquota immigration visas issued within the numerical limitations prescribed in the Displaced Persons Act shall be numbered serially in a common series from which such numbers shall be apportioned by the Department in order to keep the issuances of such visas within the numerical limitations prescribed.

(f) Quota nationality shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 12 (a) of the Immigration Act of 1924, unless expressly provided otherwise in the Displaced Persons Act. However, section 12 (a) (2) of the Immigration Act of 1924, providing that the accompanying wife under certain conditions may be charged to the quota of her husband, shall not be applicable so far as concerns the Displaced Persons Act, except section 3 (c) thereof. In all such cases the accompanying wife shall be charged to the quota of her nationality. However, section 12 (a) (1) of the Immigration Act of 1924, providing that a minor child accompanied by its alien parent shall be charged to the quota of such parent, shall apply in the case of children accompanying parents under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act.

(g) In the case of an alien applying for an immigration visa pursuant to the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act and of the Immigration Act of 1924, application Forms 256a and 256b shall be revised as follows:

(1) In the space provided in the upper left-hand corner of Form 256a and 256b, a line shall be drawn through the inapplicable words and the statement revised to read: "I claim to be an applicant under the Displaced Persons Act, and my claim is based on the following facts."

(2) In the adjoining space provided below on Form 256a and 256b the statement shall be revised to read: "Available documents required by the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, and the Displaced Persons Act are filed herewith and made a part hereof as follows."

(3) The clause at the lower end of the visa application form beginning with the word "Wherefore" shall be revised to read: "Wherefore, I apply for an Immigration Visa pursuant to the provisions of the Immigration Act of 1924 and the Displaced Persons Act."

(4) On the reverse side of Form 256a and 256b, the blank space opposite the fifth "box" shall be used to show the classification of persons under the Displaced Persons Act, except Greek preferentials as classified in section 45.2 (d) (4) and as to which the usual procedure shall be followed. In this connection, reference shall be made to the specific subsection or subdivision of the Displaced Persons Act under which the applicant is classified followed by a descriptive designation as used to identify the several classes of applicants in section 45.2, for example, "Section 2 (c)—Eligible displaced person," or Section 2 (e)—Eligible displaced orphan," or "Section 2 (g)—Venezia Giulia refugee," or "Section 3 (b) (2)—China Refugee," or "Section 12 (a)—German ethnic origin."

(5) On the reverse side of Form 256a and 256b, the statement directly above the space provided for the signature of the visa-issuing officer shall be revised to read: "The bearer, who is of (citizen or subject) nationality, having been seen and examined, is classified as a (insert descriptive designation used above) and is granted this immigration visa pursuant to the provisions of the Immigration Act of 1924 and the Displaced Persons Act."

SEC. 45.6. Exemptions—(a) Visa fees: No fee shall be charged for an immigration visa, or application therefor, issued to an eligible displaced person, an eligible displaced orphan, a person of German ethnic origin, or a section 12 (c) adopted child. In all other cases of applicants under the Displaced Persons Act, the issuance of an immigration visa shall be subject to payment of the prescribed fee of $1 for the application and $9 for the visa.

(b) Contract labor and assisted immigration: The excluding provisions of section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended (39 Stat. 875–878; 8 U. S. C. 136), relating to contract labor and the payment of an alien's ticket or passage by another, or by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government, either directly or indirectly, shall not be applicable to persons whose admission into the United States is authorized under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act: Provided, That the benefits of exemption from the contract-labor provision of section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, which are provided by section 3 (b) (5) of the Displaced Persons Act, shall not apply in the case of a person whose application under the Displaced Persons Act is based on the submission of an affidavit or other evidence of support. In lieu thereof, the applicant may submit assurances, as provided in section 45.7 of this part, in order to have the benefits of such exemption.

SEC. 45.7 Assurances under sections 3 (b) and 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act—(a) Assurances in lieu of affidavits of support: In lieu of affidavits of support or other evidence of support, a person authorized to be admitted under sections 3 (b) and 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act may submit to consular officers assurances by a citizen or citizens of the United States in such form as is prescribed in this section, which shall provide that such person, if admitted into the United States, will be suitably employed without displacing some other person from employment, and that such person and the members of his family who shall accompany and who propose to live with him shall not become public charges and will have housing without displacing some other person from such housing. Either form of evidence shall be acceptable and either may be used for different individuals, except that an affidavit of support may be submitted by an alien resident of the United States as well as by a citizen of the United States. The term "citizen or citizens of the United States" shall include (1) domestic corporations, partnerships or other firms having their principal place of business within the United States; and (2) American public or voluntary agencies recognized by the Department for this purpose: Provided, That a voluntary agency within the meaning of this part shall be an agency which provides services in connection with the immigration, settlement, or welfare of aliens: And provided further, That the officer or member of such corporation, partnership, firm, or agency who executes the assurance in its behalf shall be a citizen of the United States.

(b) Assurance of employment: (1) The assurance that an applicant will be suitably employed without displacing some other person from employment shall provide such information as may be required to satisfy the responsible consular officer that (i) suitable activities for salary, wages, or other gain are to be made available to the applicant by, through, or on behalf of the individual or agency furnishing the assurance; (ii) the wages or compensation offered are not less than the prevailing rate for like activity in the community where the employment is pursued; (iii) the employment is of a permanent or indefinite nature and will be available at the time of the arrival of the applicant in the United States; and (iv) that no person will be removed from employment because of the activities to be performed by the applicant.

(2) Assurance that an applicant will, as his principal activity, attend regular sessions at a school in the United States and that he will undertake studies appropriate to his age and prior scholastic attainment shall, for the purposes of the Displaced Persons Act, be deemed to be assurance that the applicant will be suitably employed.

(3) If the employment is to be provided by an individual other than the person furnishing the required assurances, a statement in triplicate from the prospective employer, preferably on the business stationery of such employer, shall accompany the assurances, which statement shall contain a specific offer of employment, and shall indicate the place, nature, and anticipated duration, and other pertinent data relative thereto. The original of such statement shall accompany Form 256a; the duplicate thereof shall be attached to Form 256b; and the third copy given to the alien.

(c) Assurance of housing: The assurance that the principal applicant and the members of his family who will accompany him and who propose to live with him will have housing without displacing some other person from such housing shall provide such information as may be required to satisfy the responsible consular officer that (i) adequate housing will be available to the applicants upon arrival in the United States, and (ii) no occupant of such housing will be displaced therefrom in order to accommodate the occupancy of such applicants.

(d) Assurance against becoming a public charge: The assurance against becoming a public charge shall provide such information as may be required to satisfy the responsible consular officer that neither the principal applicant nor any of the members of his family who will accompany him and who propose to live with him will become a public charge.

(e) Assurance of transportation: In the case of an applicant who is ineligible for transportation provided by the International Refugee Organization, or by the Commission, the consular officer shall be satisfied, prior to the issuance of a visa to the applicant, that adequate arrangements will be made for the transportation of such applicant from his place of foreign residence to his destination in the United States, and in support thereof the consular officer may require the submission of such supplemental assurances as he deems necessary.

(f) Forms of assurances: (1) The assurances referred to in paragraphs (b), (c), (d), and (e) of this section shall be in such written form as may be prescribed by the Department and, except for the assurances submitted by public agencies or voluntary agencies approved by the Department, shall be sworn to or affirmed before a notary public or other person authorized to administer oaths or affirmations. Assurance forms may be obtained from such public agencies or voluntary agencies or from the Visa Division, Department of State, Washington 25, D. C.

(2) The assurance form prescribed for the purpose of this section shall contain the following statement immediately preceding the jurat: "I am furnishing this assurance fully mindful of the provisions of section 15 of the Displaced Persons Act providing that any person or persons who knowingly violate or conspire to violate any provision of such act, except section 9, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 or more than $10,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than 2 or more than 10 years, or both."

(g) Adequacy of assurances: If the consular officer is satisfied that the assurances submitted pursuant to the provisions of this section meet the requirements of the Displaced Persons Act and the regulations contained in this part, he may proceed to a further consideration of the applicant's eligibility under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act, and his eligibility to receive an immigration visa under the general immigration laws and regulations. If the consular officer is not satisfied that the assurances meet such requirements, he may require the sponsor to provide additional information relative thereto. If such additional information is not submitted within a reasonable time, or if submitted, does not meet the requirements of the Displaced Persons Act and the regulations contained in this part, the consular officer shall discontinue consideration of the application based on such assurances, and shall notify the applicant and the sponsor of his action.

(h) Named and unnamed assurances: Assurances submitted to a consular officer as provided in this section may be either named assurances (identifying the particular applicant by name), or unnamed assurances (not identifying the applicant by name but requesting admission of an alien having specific skills or other qualifications): Provided, That in the case of an applicant under section 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act only named assurances may be submitted.

(i) Public agencies and voluntary agencies: For the purpose of this section, public agencies and voluntary agencies shall include only such agencies as are recognized by the Department, and consular officers shall not accept assurances from any agency not so recognized and included in an approved list thereof furnished by the Department. Assurances submitted by public agencies or voluntary agencies shall conform to all the applicable requirements prescribed in this section.

(j) Assurances, section 2, orphans—(1) Greek orphans: Assurances required by subsection (e) of section (2) of the Displaced Persons Act in the case of a Greek orphan shall be submitted to the Commission in accordance with the regulations thereof as contained in 8 CFR, parts 700–710 (15 F. R. 3864). In areas where the operations of the Commission do not extend, such assurances, upon being validated by the Commission, will be forwarded to the appropriate consular office.

(2) Section 2 (f) orphans: The procedure prescribed in subparagraph (1) of this paragraph shall be applicable in the cases of orphans defined in subsection (f) of section (2) of the Displaced Persons Act, except that the assurance required thereunder may be given either by a citizen of the United States or by an alien admitted to the United States for permanent residence, and shall be submitted to the Commission prior to June 30, 1951: Provided, That no immigration visa shall be issued subsequent to June 30, 1952, to an orphan defined in subsection (f) of section 2 of the Displaced Persons Act.

Consular officers are authorized to administer the required oath or affirmation without fee.

(b) The affidavit provided for in paragraph (a) of this section shall be executed in duplicate in accordance with the terms of a prescribed form to be furnished by the Department. The original of such affidavit shall be attached to visa application Form 256a, and a duplicate copy thereof shall be attached to Form 256b.

Section 45.9. Disqualification to receive visas: (a) No visa shall be issued to any applicant whose admission under the Displaced Persons Act is based on the submission of an assurance of suitable employment unless the applicant shall first execute the good-faith affidavit required by section 6 of the Displaced Persons Act and the regulations contained in this part.

(b) No alien shall be issued a visa of any kind under the general immigration laws and regulations or under the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the alien has willfully made a misrepresentation for the purpose of gaining admission into the United States as an eligible displaced person. In any case involving a reasonable doubt, the consular officer shall communicate with the Department with a view to obtaining an advisory opinion, and shall submit with his communication all the pertinent facts on which such doubt is based.

(c) No applicant shall be issued an immigration visa as an eligible displaced person, as a person of German ethnic origin, or as a section 12 (c) adopted child, in the absence of a written report from the Commission concerning his character, history, and eligibility as required by sections 10 and 12 of the Displaced Persons Act.

(d) No applicant shall be issued an immigration visa if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the applicant, subject to the exemptions expressly provided in section 45.6 (b), is excluded from admission to the United States under any of the provisions of the immigration laws and regulations, or if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the applicant is not entitled to the specific classification under which he makes application.

(e) No applicant shall be issued an immigration visa if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that:

(c) In the event that all of the special classes of persons enumerated in paragraph (b) of this section do not receive the total of 39,000 visas authorized for such classes, the unused portion shall be made available to qualified aliens classifiable as eligible displaced persons to the extent of such unused portion but not in excess of 341,000.

(d) The number of immigration visas which may be issued to "out-of-zone" refugees pursuant to the provisions of section 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act shall be determined by the current numerical limitations on the quotas of the countries concerned.

(e) All persons receiving visas pursuant to the provisions of the Displaced Persons Act shall be charged to their proper quota on a current-year or a future-year basis, except the 5,000 eligible displaced orphans for whom special nonquota immigration visas are provided by section 3 (b) (1) of the Displaced Persons Act, and the 5,000 orphans under the age of 10 years for whom special nonquota immigration visas are provided by section 2 (f) of that Act, and other applicants who qualify for nonquota status under the general immigration laws.

(f) The number of immigration visas which may be issued to adopted children pursuant to the provisions of section 12 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act, exclusive of those which may be issued to such adopted children who qualify as persons of German ethnic origin, shall be determined by current numerical limitations on the immigration quotas of Germany and Austria.

(g) A quota number used in issuing an immigration visa to a particular applicant shall not be used in the issuance of a visa to any other applicant even though the original recipient thereof fails, for any reason, to use his immigration visa.

(h) A replace visa may be issued to the original applicant under the same number of the same quota, or to a nonquota applicant, during the effective period of the particular provisions of the Displaced Persons Act under which the applicant was classified and was issued his original visa: Provided, That in applying therefor the applicant is found to be still qualified to receive a replace visa under the same provisions of the Displaced Persons Act as were originally applicable to his case. If the original visa was allotted from a current quota, no replace visa may be issued subsequent to the quota year in which such original visa was issued.

SEC. 45.11. Quota control: The following rules are prescribed to govern the administration of immigration quotas under the Immigration Act of 1924 as affected by the Displaced Persons Act:

(a) The first 50 percent of the quota of each nationality for each of the fiscal years beginning July 1, 1950, shall be made available for the issuance of immigration visas to qualified applicants of the first-preference quota class specified in section 6 (a) (1) of the Immigration Act of 1924.

(b) The remainder, if any, of the 50 percent of each quota referred to in paragraph (a) of this section shall be made available for the issuance of immigration visas to qualified applicants of the second-preference quota class specified in section 6 (a) (2) of the Immigration Act of 1924.

(c) Any portion of the first 50 percent of each annual quota referred to in paragraph (a) of this section not required for the issuance of immigration visas to qualified applicants entitled to first or second preference under the provisions of sections 6 (a) (1) or 6 (a) (2) of the Immigration Act of 1924, shall be made available to aliens qualifying for nonpreference status under the provisions of section 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act and section 6 (a) (3) of the Immigration Act of 1924: Provided, That not more than 50 percent of such unrequired portion shall be made available to applicants qualifying under the provisions of section 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act.

(d) Twenty-five percent of the quota of each nationality, for each of the fiscal years beginning July 1, 1950, and ending June 30, 1954, shall be made available for the issuance of immigration visas to qualified applicants under all provisions of the Displaced Persons Act, except section 3 (c) thereof, and for persons whose cases are adjusted under section 19 (c) of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended, and for persons whose cases are adjusted under section 4 of the Displaced Persons Act: Provided, That beginning July 1, 1954, as much as 50 percent of any quota may be used in any fiscal year for persons covered by this paragraph.

(e) During the fiscal years beginning July 1, 1950, and ending June 30, 1954, 25 percent of each annual quota, exclusive of the 50 percent (first preference immigrants) referred to in paragraph (a) of this section, and the 25 percent (displaced persons) referred to in paragraph (d) of this section, shall be made available first for the issuance of immigration visas to qualified applicants entitled to preference under the provisions of section 6 (a) (2) of the Immigration Act of 1924, and second to qualified applicants under the provisions of section 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act: Provided, That not more than 50 percent of the quota numbers not required for issuance to qualified applicants under the provisions of section 6 (a) (2) of the Immigration Act of 1924 shall be made available for issuance to qualified applicants under the provisions of section 3 (c) of the Displaced Persons Act: Provided further, That any residue of such 25 percent shall be made available for issuance to qualified applicants entitled to nonpreference status under the provisions of section 6 (a) (3) of the Immigration Act of 1924.

(f) The reduction of a quota as required by the enactment of private acts by the Congress shall operate to reduce that particular portion of each annual quota from which a quota number is most readily available.

This order shall become effective upon publication in the Federal Register. Compliance with the provisions of section 4 of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 238; U. S. C. 1003) relative to notice of proposed rule making and delayed effective date is unnecessary because the regulations contained in this order involved foreign-affairs functions of the United States.

JAMES E. WEBB,
Acting Secretary of State.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1950.

Recommended, so far as the provisions of the Immigration Act of 1924 and the Alien Registration Act, 1940, are concerned:

Philippine Support of United Nations Forces Against Communist Aggression

OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, as a recipient of the speech of the Honorable Camilo Osias, a distinguished member of the Philippine Senate and a former colleague of great ability who served with us in this House as Resident Commissioner for his Government, I am impelled to invoke the privilege accorded me and to insert in the RECORD the speech delivered by him on August 7, 1950.

The speech deserves preservation in the RECORD of the Congress of the United States where it will remain available to our people for their perusal and edification. It should serve to convince even the skeptics that despite political differences in the Philippine Islands, there is unity upon the question of Korea and the course pursued by the United States and supported by the United Nations.

It is to be noted that Mr. Osias is a member of the minority party and that he is critical of the Chief Executive, President Elpedio Quirino, and of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Carlos Romulo, both of whom are my good friends of many years' standing, and to which criticism I do not subscribe.

However, Mr. Speaker, the speech is doubly significant and illustrates the point I desire to call to your attention and to emphasize, which is despite partisan differences and criticism, on the crucial question of Korea there is unqualified support and agreement. In his peroration the Senator from La Union refers to the binding ties between the Governments of the United States and the Philippines which warms the cockles of my heart and proves to me anew and to the world that I have reckoned correctly upon the undying friendship of the Filipinos, who over the half century became wed to the people of the United States and thus by their ties of sentiment, affection, and appreciation are in reality related to us by custom, language, and democracy.

The speech follows:

[Second Congress of the Republic of the Philippines, second special session, begun and held at the city of Manila on Tuesday, the 1st day of August 1950]

Concurrent Resolution 16

Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress of the Philippines to render every possible assistance to the United Nations forces in the Korean conflict

Whereas, on June 25, 1950, the armies of North Korea crossed the thirty-eighth parallel and without cause or provocation attacked the Republic of Korea;

Whereas despite the cease-fire directive of the Security Council of the United Nations issued on the day of the aggression, the North Korean armies pressed the attack on South Korea, thereby causing the Security Council to meet again on June 27, 1950, and approve a resolution calling on all members of the United Nations to "furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack";

Whereas it is the duty of the Republic of the Philippines under article 25 of the UN Charter "to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council," a duty which is accentuated by the fact that the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Philippines is the present President of the United Nations General Assembly;

Whereas apart from its obligations under the UN Charter, the Republic of the Philippines should rally enthusiastically to the support of the UN action in Korea because the fate that awaits the Republic of Korea in this crucial contest may well decide the fate of small and militarily weak nations like the Philippines;

Whereas the President of the Philippines, in his special message to Congress, declared that "the Philippine Government has pledged its support to the United Nations effort in Korea to the limit of its available resources"; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives of the Philippines concurring), To express, as it does hereby express, the sense of the Congress of the Philippines that the Republic of the Philippines should render every possible assistance to the United Nations effort in the Korean conflict, including the participation of Filipino troops, and to inform, as it does hereby inform, the President of the Philippines of its readiness to adopt such measures as may be necessary and adequate to render such assistance in the shortest possible time.

Adopted August 10, 1950.

SPEECH OF SENATOR CAMILO OSIAS, SENATOR OF THE PHILIPPINES, IN SUPPORT OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 16, EXTENDING MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO KOREA AT THE SPECIAL SESSION ON AUGUST 7, 1950

Senator OSIAS. Mr. President, I desire to be recognized on this resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT. The gentleman from La Union has the floor.

Senator OSIAS. Mr. President, the Senate has before it a resolution of national import and of international implications. It is, therefore, important; and as a minority man, I rise to make patent our consistent principle that in matters of great moment there is no need for anyone to appeal to us for unity. We are, as a party, unity in action.

This concurrent resolution calculated to make the Republic of the Philippines render ever possible assistance to the United Nations in suppressing the Korean aggression is a resolution that involves a momentous decision for every member of this august, deliberative body. For the vote that we shall cast, we will be responsible to our conscience, to our people, before the bar of public opinion and before the verdict of history. The collective will of the congress shall reveal the soul of the nation in the face of a severe trial and an impending danger. The resolution calls for calm and deliberate reflection. It will test our stature as representatives of a free and sovereign nation, and our combined judgment will measure our statesmanship. It will likewise serve as a measure whether we are fit as a people to move, live, and have our being in a society of free and civilized nations.

Before I proceed, I express the prayerful hope that neither we nor the generations who will come after us will be called upon again to have to deliberate and vote on a measure so transcendental as this.

Mr. President, our first need is to come out in the clear from the forest of confusion. There is confusion in the United Nations, there has been confusion in Washington, and there is confusion in our own land. So it is necessary that we come out in the clear, as I said, from out of this forest of confusion.

Just now the United Nations are divided. In the Security Council, the powerhouse of the United Nations, prominent members are at loggerheads. Soviet Russia with her Malik and satellites on the one hand, and the United States and the free nations represented in the Council on the other, are expressing contrary opinions. Malik, now the president of the Security Council, has propagandized the world in the name of Soviet Russia that the aggressor nation is the United States, and that those associated with her are also aggressor nations. But the opinion of the world has become clear. There is no blinking the fact that Communist-sponsored North Korea committed a perfidious act of aggression. And in the defense of the ideology of the United Nations, the United States and those associated with her in this great adventure of freedom are fighting a war of defense to keep alive and make robust the ideals incarnated in the charter of the United Nations organization.

In Washington, too, there has been confusion. At one time America abandoned Nationalist China in the continent. At another time we read President Truman observing the hands-off policy in Formosa. But more recently the happy intelligence came to us that the Commander in Chief of the Republic of America ordered the Seventh Fleet and, subsequently, some other forces to prevent aggression against Formosa and even to defend Formosa.

In our own land we have had confusion worse confounded. At one time President Quirino advocated the Pacific Union and, coming immediately after the organization of the North Atlantic Pact, he then envisaged an anti-Communist alliance. That was reaffirmed when President Quirino had a conversation with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, and later supported by Syngman Rhee. But then the political campaign was on. The white paper on China was published in Washington. The aspirant for presidential election went to Washington and after meeting American officials and Ambassador Romulo, he changed front. He turned about face. He came back and no longer talked of anti-Communist organization but of a Southeast Asia union that was non-Communist.

The stand of the Executive had been reversed. Subsequently we had the much-heralded and publicized Baguio Conference and there was neither a southeast Asia union organized nor was there a positive policy announced that would serve as a beacon light in the midst of darkness. More recently the new Secretary of Foreign Affairs was reported as having also reversed himself by abandoning a negative stand and advocating the sending of an armed force to Korea and the President turned it down on the ground that such a step would be a provocative act. The stand of the Executive has been equivocal. His foreign policy, if any, has been effeminate.

Therefore, the Senate does well in the face of this Executive indecision to take the initiative and consider this positive concurrent resolution which envisages not only the kind of assistance that we have so far given or have promised, but more, even the sending of an armed force to the scene of the bloody conflict.

We need some instrumentality like the Congress, because it is the policy-making body to initiate and define a policy, and this is its golden opportunity. It is crystal clear that we are now confronted not with a theory but with a condition. The present posture of world affairs compels us to take sides. Our stand must be unequivocal and firm.

We are drawn into the present conflict for reasons varied and sundry. But the most important is that this has clearly become a struggle between communism and democracy. And because we are wedded to the ideals of democracy, we are on the side of the democratic forces of the world.

It is well known that at one time North Korea was under the regimentation of Russia with her Communist philosophy, and that South Korea was under the sponsorship of the United States with her democratic ideology. The thirty-eighth parallel became the dividing line, but although that seemed to be at first a dividing line that was imaginary more or less, now the cleavage has become broad and deep. The line of demarcation has been thoroughly defined.

Why this crisis in Korea? It is not a spontaneous event that took place with the act of aggression committed by the North Korean forces schooled in the revolutionary technique of communism. Its root, the root of the movement, goes far back. And if I may, I should like to ask the indulgence of the Senate to permit me to invoke a few facts of history the better for our people to make a proper appraisal of the action that the Senate shall take.

It is commonly admitted that Karl Marx is a sort of patron saint of communism. Karl Marx was born in Germany of German-Jewish descent in 1818. He studied in the University of Bonn under the influence of the great German philosopher Hegel, and that being so, he, like many disciples of Germany, came under the influence of Hegelianism. What is this philosophy?

Hegel had an arbitrary and fantastic division of history into four stages: The first stage presenting the drama of the oriental world where civilization began; the second representing the civilization of the Greek States; the third when the Greek world gave way to the Roman world; and the fourth, the Germanic world was to be the climactic expression of civilization developing superlative power and to become dominant over all.

That is why we had Kaiser Wilhelm of the First World War, then Adolf Hitler in World War II advocating that Hegelian philosophy in action with Germany striving to rule the world propelled by the warlike slogan, Deutschland über alles—Germany over all. Marx was born into that epoch. He was reared in its atmosphere. He inherited much of that philosophy and so he became an active advocate of revolutionary socialism. I say revolutionary as distinguished from evolutionary socialism. The great difference between the two is that the latter deleted from its program the principles of class struggle and revolutionary technique. Revolutionary socialism, however, made class struggle and revolution the two important elements in its ideology. So when Karl Marx, together with Engels, devised the Communist Manifesto in 1848, he embodied these ideals and ideas in that document and to that manifesto may be traced much of the belief, creed, dogma, and technique of present-day communism.

In Russia bolshevism under Lenin came into being. Bolshevism may be defined as revolutionary socialism with the revolutionary aspect intensified. And so, Mr. President, I say Marxism is revolutionary socialism. Communism is aggressive Marxism further intensifying the idea of class conflict, revolutionary technique, and for that reason it thrives on confusion and disorder. It makes use of subversion, sabotage, and fifth columnism, and all manner of revolutionary procedures. Comes now Trotsky. After Lenin, Trotsky is eliminated, and Stalin emerges, fresh from World War II about which the people of Russia only know that Russia was responsible for the triumph of the Allies in the last cataclysmic war. They believe that the time has come for them to witness the abolition of all ideologies inimical to communism and the establishment of the proletarian dictatorship over the entire world. So, Mr. President, here is a philosophy that cannot but issue in war. There is no peace where communism has sway.

Democracy is our ideal. It is the ideal that impelled the framers of the Constitution of our country to enshrine the principle which renounces war as an instrument of national policy. We love peace and hate war. We believe in arbitration or mediation to settle disputes among nations. We are drawn to the present situation where we have to contend with imperialistic and armed aggression and join our forces with those of defensive peace. We cannot be apathetic, sir, in this fight against bolshevistic communism that is repugnant to the traditions of our people, to the ideals that inform our Constitution, to the sacred tenets of our religion, and to the sublime principles of government republican in form and democratic to the core.

Senator GARCIA. Mr. President, will the gentleman yield?

The ACTING PRESIDENT. The gentleman may yield if he so desires.

Senator OSIAS. If the gentleman will just allow me to develop one more thesis, I will gladly yield.

Now, the question to answer before our people and our conscience is: Why should the Philippines participate with the United Nations forces in the present conflict?

I answer first, that we must participate to make patent our sincere and loyal devotion to freedom. Unfortunately we have not yet reached the stage when freedom could be said to have been securely established upon the foundations of law and peace. We are called in the midst of this troublesome era to make freedom real and enduring. We must perforce admit that the tree of liberty in our time has yet to be nurtured by the sweat of anguish, by the tears of sorrow, and by the blood of sacrifice.

My second point is that we should participate to implement our commitments with the United Nations. The affixing of the signature of the representative of the Republic to the United Nations Charter was voluntary. We knew whereof we acted when we joined the UN. We cannot remain indifferent to our formal, voluntary, and sacred commitments.

This is not all. We are impelled to act in the direction indicated by the concurrent resolution of the Senate in order to show our sincerity in fulfilling our part of the bargain in the military assistance pact and the military bases agreement entered into by the Republic of the Philippines with the Republic of the United States of America.

It is to be presumed that the United States Government and people will faithfully and adequately carry out their part in the Military Assistance Pact in the training and development of armed forces and "in the performance of those obligations which may devolve upon the Republic of the Philippines under its international agreements" given the mutuality of interest of the two Republics.

We are also impelled to participate actively in this conflict of stopping further aggression to give validity to the value of the plighted word and to uphold the sanctity of treaties. We cannot have world peace, sir, as long as peoples do not return to common decency, common honesty, and common respect for the plighted word. We have to fulfill in all honesty our share in the contractual obligation which we have assumed in treaties to which this Republic is signatory. We must not be found wanting before the verdict of history. Let it not be said of us ever, that we as a people were ready and willing to share in the advantages but we eschewed or shirked the burdens and sacrifices which every solemn compact entails.

And I wish to say a word from the standpoint of enlightened self-interest. Our participation with other free nations in this struggle would give the people of the Philippines a new sense of mission. This new sense of mission will vitalize our unity. It will galvanize the solidarity of our people at home. I wish even our dissidents will heed these words. There is no use to pay lip service to unity unless and until there is an ideology, unless there is a clear sense of mission around which all people irrespective of political affiliation or creed may rally.

Mr. President, I glory in the opportunity to cast my vote in favor of this resolution because the action initiated by Congress will serve as a polestar to the orientation of our future culture and civilization.

The United Nations, sir, has to win this war. It cannot afford to lose it. Korea today; perchance Iran tomorrow; Berlin and then Formosa next. It will be a history from aggression to aggression replete with losses of property valued by the trillions, and lives counted by the millions.

The League of Nations which was the aftermath of the First World War did not succeed because it could not enforce its decisions. The League lacked teeth. The United Nations which is the aftermath of the Second World War must not fail now that it is a body determined to implement is resolutions with action, action commensurate with the gravity of the challenge, action suitable to meet the present aggression, action understandable to communism which no longer contents itself with subversion, sabotage, and fifth columnism only but resorts to armed aggression.

The aggressiveness of violence by communism has to be stopped in its tracks. This cannot be accomplished by apathy or appeasement. It can only be done through active cooperation among like-minded nations committed to freedom and the democratic way of life.

Mr. President, the frontiers of freedom must be extended. The area of freedom must not be permitted to contract. This can be achieved through implementing the decisions of the United Nations organization and its agencies, especially the Security Council.

After due reflection I came to a definite conclusion. I announce that I shall give my support and vote to this resolution, evincing thereby my sense of obligation and responsibility as a citizen of the Republic of the Philippines and as a citizen of the one world that is being fashioned. I believe that every member of this august body will do likewise and I urge, Mr. President, that we all give our vote and support to this concurrent resolution to make this Republic more active in its participation to bolster the United Nations in suppressing the Korean aggression; and this we must do as an evidence of our determination to fight aggression and as an act of faith in humanity's relentless forward march from victory to victory until all nations at last shall in full measure enjoy the blessings of freedom and democracy, of peace and security.

QUESTIONS BY SENATOR GARCIA

Senator GARCIA. Mr. President, I would like to ask a few questions from the gentleman.

The ACTING PRESIDENT. The gentleman may yield if he so desires.

Senator OSIAS. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Bohol.

Senator GARCIA. I take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman from La Union for the eloquent and masterly speech he has given in support of the resolution now under consideration. Since the gentleman has evinced mastery of the facts relative to this question I would like to take advantage of the floor of the senate by asking the gentleman from La Union an answer to certain opinions presented in the public hearings of the committee on foreign affairs and the committee on national defense held before this day, to the effect that the question in Korea is a home fight or a civil war between two sectors of one country, and that since we adhere by our constitution to the international law which sanctions nonintervention in a case of a civil war that may happen in a country, basing upon those arguments they have alleged and have continued to allege that the intervention of the Philippines in the Korean affair would be an unwarranted interference in a civil war which properly belongs to the Koreans. I would like to ask the gentleman from La Union to answer this argument.

Senator OSIAS. I do not subscribe to the idea that this is a mere civil war. I already stated that I am drawn to the conclusion that it is an active trial of strength between two ideologies, one committed to aggression, the other to peace and to the democratic processes of conciliation and mediation. We are not in error when we follow in the footsteps of fifty-odd nations, over 50 free and civilized nations of the world, that have come out squarely, characterizing the Communist-sponsored invasion of the Republic of Korea as a raw act of aggression menacing the peace and security of the world. I believe further that this is one time when we can do our part as a signatory of the Charter of the United Nations "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small."

Korea in her history and geography demonstrates considerable parallelism with ours. If we do not rally to the cause of freedom and democracy in Korea today, tomorrow, God forbid, we may also fall a prey to the evil designs of aggressor nations. In that eventuality what right have we to expect the cooperation of other free nations of the world? So I cast aside the theory that this is but a home fight, a civil war, that this is a matter for the Koreans only to decide because of the additional fact that Korea as a republic came into being under the sponsorship of the United States with which nation we are bound by ties that brook no breaking and sponsored also by the United Nations organization of which we are a member. That, in brief, would be my answer to the question of the gentleman which I know is a query that does not reflect his opinion but that he is voicing it as an opinion from certain quarters inimical to the stand taken by the United Nations.

Mr. President, if there are no further questions, I ask that we vote on the resolution.

How Low Can They Go?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER E. BREHM

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, this letter is directed to all justice-loving Americans, but particularly to those living within the Eleventh Congressional District of Ohio:

FELLOW AMERICANS: It is true, but hard to believe, that any group would deliberately jeopardize a person's character in the hope of winning a congressional seat in Congress.

This will give you some idea of how desperately they need seats and the length to which they will go in an effort to elect those pledged to support a program which, if enacted, would in the opinion of millions force national socialism upon the American people.

When they selected Drew Pearson to spread their lying propaganda they revealed the contemptible and cowardly side of their nature.

Some of you will recall the 1944 election when I faced this same unscrupulous outfit. You will recall at that time they tried a sneak smear attack on my integrity which boomeranged when the decent, honest, Christian law-abiding citizens of this district rose up in righteous indignation at such a spectacle.

In 1944 the articles were signed J. E. Moore, secretary, Underwood for Congress Committee, New Lexington, Ohio. That proved to be a fatal error and definitely identified the source of the attack to the voters.

The strategy this time was to have someone else open the sneak attack and thus divert attention from the real source.

Isn't it strange how people revert to type? This J. E. Moore is a typical example. He is the fellow who is evidently having such a jolly good time spending hundreds and hundreds of dollars reproducing in the local papers the lies and insinuations which were undoubtedly given Mr. Pearson to publicize. In this way it was probably felt that attention would not only be diverted from the birthplace of this illegitimate offspring but also from the real and vital issues facing us at this time. It is a typical attack used by some of the more radical left-wing leaders of the CIO-PAC who have again endorsed my opponent just as they did in 1944.

Yes, the voice of Jacob but the hand of Esau is readily heard and seen.

Ninteen hundred and forty-four: J. E. Moore, secretary, my opponent's committee for Congress.

Nineteen hundred and fifty: J. E. Moore, secretary, Eleventh District Taxpayers Committee.

It should just be "tax sufferers committee."

Ever since the primary I had been warned to expect something. When one opposes this combine he knows that anything can happen and usually does. Therefore, I was not too surprised when the Department of Justice received a letter containing wild and unfounded accusations from a fellow identified as a Democratic politician.

I therefore decided that not only should the unfounded accusations contained in this letter be investigated but also that it should be extended to include everyone who had ever been connected with my office.

Let's quote from two letters:

"SEPTEMBER 13, 1950.

"Mr. LOUIS B. NICHOLS,
"Assistant Chief, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR MR. NICHOLS: Will you please let me know if the investigation which your agency was recently authorized to make regarding various and past personnel affiliated with my congressional office has been completed? If it has been completed, will you please give me the date of completion.

"Thanking you for your cooperation, I remain,

"Sincerely yours,
"WALTER E. BREHM,
"Member of Congress."

"UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
"FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION,
"OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
"Washington, D. C., September 13, 1950.

"Hon. WALTER E. BREHM,
"House of Representatives,
"Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I wish to acknowledge your communication of September 13 addressed to Mr. Nichols, wherein you inquire regarding the status of the recent investigation which was conducted by the FBI. * * *

"In response to your specific inquiry, the investigation requested of the FBI was completed * * * under date of August 25, 1950.

"Sincerely yours,
"J. EDGAR HOOVER."

Does Drew Pearson have more information than the FBI?

I realize that they have powerful connections in Washington and that anything could happen just before the election.

I know of nothing else which I can do at this time to prove that these charges are the most despicable and the most maliciously inspired that could possibly be conceived.

I have turned this entire subject over to my attorneys for a possible libel suit.

The lie breaks quicker and travels faster from the starting gate, but truth will eventually catch up, take the lead in the stretch, and win the reward.

Therefore, until the final chapter is written I trust that you will continue to keep faith with me.

Most sincerely,

WALTER E. BREHM,
Member of Congress.

Résumé of the Internal Security Act of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAT McCARRAN
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a résumé of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A RÉSUMÉ OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950

(By Hon. PAT MCCARRAN)

FOREWORD

On September 23, 1950, the Congress of the United States passed over the veto of the President, the Internal Security Act of 1950, to protect the United States against Communists and other subversives. In view of the barrage of propaganda which has been directed at this law—by the persons and organizations coming within its purview—there is herein set forth an objective analysis of the principal provisions of this law so that the reader may judge for himself whether or not it constitutes thought control or in any way contravenes the basic rights guaranteed by the Constitution. It is to be noted that the American Bar Association, which numbers among its members the ablest constitutional lawyers in the Nation, adopted a resolution endorsing this law.

The law is entitled the "Internal Security Act of 1950" and consists of two parts, title I and title II, respectively. Title I is known as the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 and title II is known as the Emergency Detention Act of 1950.

TITLE I—THE SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL ACT OF 1950

Registration requirements

Communist-action organizations and the members thereof, and Communist-front organizations and the officers thereof are required to be registered with the Attorney General. This provision is substantially the same as the registration provision of the present law under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act and under the Foreign Agents Registration Act.

Such organizations are required to file with the Attorney General periodic financial statements and to identify their literature and radio and television programs; and no deduction for Federal income-tax purposes is allowed for contributions to such organizations.

The law does not outlaw the Communist Party or prohibit membership in any organization. The purpose of the registration provision is to force the Communist organizations out into the open.

A Communist-action organization is defined as any organization in the United States (other than a diplomatic representative or mission of a foreign government accredited as such by the Department of State) which (1) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement, and (2) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement.

A Communist-front organization is defined as any organization in the United States (other than a Communist-action organization) which (A) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by a Communist-action organization; and (B) is primarily operated for the purpose of giving aid and support to a Communist-action organization, a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement.

The term "Communist organization" means a Communist-action organization or a Communist-front organization.

Whenever the Attorney General finds that an organization or individual has not registered when required to do so, he shall file a petition with a bipartisan board, known as the Subversive Activities Control Board, in which he sets forth the charges. A copy of the petition is served on the organization or individual, and a public hearing is held in which the organization or individual is afforded the right to counsel, to offer evidence and to cross-examine witnesses; and the decision of the Board is subject to review by the courts.

The criminal provisions of the law may be invoked only through the normal judicial processes, including all of the customary rights, such as the right to trial by jury. The law specifically states that it shall not be construed to authorize, require, or establish military or civilian censorship or in any way to limit or infringe upon freedom of the press or of speech as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and no regulation shall be promulgated hereunder having that effect.

Prohibited acts

The following acts are made unlawful:

1. To knowingly combine, conspire, or agree with any person to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship, the direction and control of which is to be under the domination or control of, any foreign government, foreign organization, or foreign individual; provided that this shall not apply to the proposal of a constitutional amendment.

2. For an officer or employee of the United States to transmit defense secrets to agents of foreign governments, unless specifically authorized to do so.

3. For agents of foreign governments to obtain defense secrets of the United States unless specifically authorized to do so.

4. For members of Communist organizations to conceal their membership in such organizations when seeking nonelective office or employment under the United States or in any defense facility, or to hold any nonelective office or employment under the United States.

5. For officers or employees of the United States or of any defense facility to knowingly contribute funds or services to Communist organizations.

6. For members of Communist-action organizations to engage in employment in any defense facility.

7. For members of Communist organizations to use a United States passport.

Espionage and sabotage provisions

The espionage and sabotage laws are strengthened by tightening the provisions of the law relating to the obtaining, possession, or transmission of defense secrets, and by broadening the categories of defense facilities subject to security regulations. Moreover, the time within which prosecutions may be brought for the violation of certain espionage and sabotage laws is extended.

Registration of foreign agents

The Foreign Agents Registration Act is amended by requiring the registration with the Department of Justice of certain persons who have been trained by a foreign government in espionage, counterespionage, or sabotage.

Immigration provisions

All aliens whose entry into the United States would endanger the public safety are excludable, and if their presence in the United States endangers the public safety, they are deportable. Aliens who are members of Communist organizations, except certain aliens in diplomatic status, are excludable and deportable. It is to be noted that the Attorney General of the United States testified that an analysis of 4,984 of the more militant members of the Communist Party in the United States showed that 91.4 percent of the total were of foreign stock or were married to persons of foreign stock.

The Attorney General is empowered to place under supervision or in detention aliens who have been found to be deportable, while arrangements are being made to effect their deportation. If the deportation is not effected within 6 months the Attorney General must release the aliens and may place them under supervision. A violation of the terms of supervision is made an offense, subject to normal court trial.

It is made a penal offense for aliens in the criminal, immoral, and subversive classes who are found to be deportable to willfully fail to depart from the United States, subject to normal court trial.

The statistics of the Immigration and Naturalization Service show that there are literally thousands of aliens who have been found to be deportable, but because of certain technicalities in the law, their deportation cannot be effected. Although many of these aliens are in the criminal, immoral, and subversive classes, under the preexisting law, they were free to roam the country at will, without supervision or restraint.

Naturalization provisions

Naturalization is prohibited to (a) members of Communist organizations, except members of Communist-front organizations who esetablish that they were innocent dupes, (b) aliens who are subject to deportation, (c) aliens who cannot read, write, and speak the English language if physically able to do so, and (d) aliens who refuse to bear arms if required to do so by law, unless they establish that they have bona fide religious scruples against bearing arms.

Denaturalization proceedings may be instituted against persons who join Communist organizations within 5 years of their naturalization, except in the case of persons who join Communist-front organizations and who establish that they were innocent dupes.

Prohibiting the picketing of Federal courts

It is made unlawful for anyone, with the intent of interfering with the administration of justice, or with the intent of influencing any judge, juror, witness, or court officer, in the discharge of his duty, to picket or demonstrate in or near a Federal courthouse. This provision was prompted by the mass picketing of Federal courts by Communists and Communist sympathizers in proceedings involving Communists. Pickets have ranged from 300 to 750 and the noise created by loud chanting (and in one instance, by a sound truck) seriously hampered the administration of justice.

TITLE II—THE EMERGENCY DETENTION ACT OF 1950

Declaration of internal security emergency

The President is empowered to proclaim the existence of an internal security emergency in the event of any one of the following:

1. Invasion of the territory of the United States or its possessions;
2. Declaration of war by Congress; or
3. Insurrection within the United States in aid of a foreign enemy.

Detention during emergency

During the existence of an internal security emergency the President, acting through the Attorney General, is authorized to detain persons as to whom it is found that there is reasonable ground to believe that such persons probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or of sabotage.

Procedural safeguards

Persons who are apprehended are accorded a prompt preliminary hearing, a review by a bipartisan board, known as the Detention Review Board and may appeal to the courts. They are afforded full opportunity to be represented by counsel and have the right to testify, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses and to cross-examine adverse witnesses. The act specifically states that it shall not be construed to suspend or to authorize the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. It further requires that no person detained under the act shall be confined in company with persons who are confined pursuant to the criminal laws of the United States or of any State, or be required to perform forced labor.

Hon. Chan Gurney, of South Dakota

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the following statement I made in regard to the retirement of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY].

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, I do not want this session of the Congress to end without my adding my tribute to those of my colleagues who have expressed regret over the coming departure from our midst of the senior Senator from South Dakota, CHAN GURNEY.

Others have spoken of his great contribution to our national defense, but I desire to point out the very real service which he has rendered in the development of the great natural resources of our country as a member of the Appropriations Committee and particularly as chairman of the Civil Functions Subcommittee of that great committee during the Eightieth Congress.

As you know, flood control and navigation are very vital to my State of Louisiana. Senator GURNEY over a long period, and repeatedly, has indicated in very substantial ways his great interest in our problem and has contributed greatly to their solution. He took the time and trouble on more than one occasion to visit with us in Louisiana and learn first-hand our problems and consistently expressed a sympathetic interest in them. He has many friends in Louisiana who I know share my regret in his leaving this body. I am sure that all of them join me in wishing him well in any future endeavor.

Far East Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD various communications from Alfred Kohlberg, of New York City, relative to the Far East situation.

The first of these communications is dated September 19, 1950, and was addressed to the chief editorial writer of various publications.

The second communication, dated August 30, 1950, is addressed to President Harry S. Truman, suggesting a certain procedure in the Far East. It includes a bill of particulars, numbered 1 to 61, outlining the conditions and events leading up to the present situation in the Far East, and a portion of Mr. Kohlberg's testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee on June 10, 1948.

The third communication is a letter addressed to Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, dated July 13, 1950; and the fourth is a letter to the Honorable Herbert Brownell, Jr., of New York, dated June 28, 1944, outlining the Far East situation.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALFRED KOHLBERG, INC.,
New York, N. Y., September 19, 1950.

To the CHIEF EDITORIAL WRITER:

If General MacArthur was correct in his semisuppressed statement to the VFW, that Formosa was essential to our entire Pacific defense, and that Korea was not even worthy of mention, strategically, then the enclosed appeal to Governor Dewey should have the careful attention of every Republican.

If the administration is expending American lives and money in strategically unimportant Korea in order to make a deal for the Communist conquest of strategically vital Formosa, the Republican Party has a duty to warn the country before it is too late. The enclosed letter, written Governor Dewey last July, becomes of utmost urgency, as the UN Assembly meets this week.

The Republic of China is still officially our ally in the unsettled war with Japan, and is likewise our ally in the UN police action in Korea, even though we refused her offer of three divisions.

If we now abandon that ally, as we abandoned the Republic of Poland and the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, we must be prepared to understand the hesitation on the part of European nations when we urge them to full alliance.

Very sincerely yours,

ALFRED KOHLBERG.

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 30, 1950.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: President Wilson said: "We do not need less criticism in time of war, but more. * * * Honesty and competence require no shield of secrecy."

Believing that you agree with President Wilson, I respectfully suggest that you:

1. Study the attached bill of particulars, gathered from various sources.

2. Reveal to your fellow citizens all the still-secret documents of importance, the names of your advisers and the occasions for such advice, in connection with each of the items enumerated.

3. Replace the above advisers with men whom time has proven sound and authoritative on the dangers of world communism.

Mr. President, the security of the Republic is at issue. The hour is late. I beseech you to rise above business-as-usual, spending-as-usual, bureaucracy-as-usual, and politics-as-usual. I fully realize that the Republican Party has failed sufficiently to protest the sell-out of the free world step by step as it occurred; they have gone along in eastern Europe in the bipartisan appeasement of the Soviet Union, while protesting about China. They must share the blame. Final responsibility, however, is yours.

It will never be too late to adopt a policy aimed at the overthrow of the tyranny that rules from Moscow, so that a free world may again return to the ways of peace with justice. Such a policy should be as publicly proclaimed as is the Communist "program" for the conquest of the world. Americans do not lack courage nor thrive on secret conspiracy. Tell us, I beg you, where we have been, where we are, and where we are going.

Are we going to the thirty-eighth parallel—to the Manchurian border—to the aid of all threatened nations whether they are willing to fight or not—to pamper their own Red fifth columnists or not—or will we go on to the final overthrow of the tyrannical Red slave state that rules from the Kremlin?

Most respectfully yours,

ALFRED KOHLBERG.

(Enclosures: Bill of particulars; statement of June 10, 1948.)

BILL OF PARTICULARS

1. It was widely reported that the candidate for Vice President on the Democratic ticket at the Chicago convention of 1944 was cleared with Sidney Hillman. You were selected. Since then it has been revealed that among Mr. Hillman's advisers were John Abt, C. B. Baldwin, Lee Pressman, and Nathan Witt. If there was any understanding, no matter how inconsequential, it would be a matter of public interest. Recently, the Treasury spent 2 months investigating my affairs for 1946–47. I considered this right and proper. Parents of Americans who will die under your command have a right to ask whether there was an understanding between you and Mr. Hillman, and whether that understanding was reduced to writing. Though Government witnesses have since then identified Messrs. Abt, Pressman, and Witt as Soviet espionage agents, they have not been arrested. Unexplained, it is disturbing.

2. When you became President you were bound by President Roosevelt's military agreements with our allies. Under our constitutional system, territorial, economic, and political agreements could not be binding until confirmed by the Senate. According to the memoirs of Secretary Stettinius, President Roosevelt made this perfectly clear to Prime Minister Churchill and Generalissimo Stalin at Yalta. Therefore, you started with a clean slate, and what has happened since 1945 must be credited to you.

3. When you assumed office you were the Commander in Chief of the greatest Air Force, greatest Navy, and most powerful Army in the history of the world. The military alliance you headed included nations totaling 1,890,000,000 people. Complete and unconditional victory was only 4 months distant.

Of our then military allies only 190,000,000 owed allegiance to the dictatorship in the Kremlin. One billion seven hundred million comprised the population of governments who ruled by consent of their people, expressed in accordance with their traditional forms. On the day of victory the odds in the UN were 3 to 1 against the Communist tyranny.

Today, 830,000,000 people are ruled from the Kremlin; while our military allies are an unknown quantity, if any. The most optimistic estimate would count only the Anzacs, the Chinese Nationalists, western Europe, and the Western Hemisphere as on our side when the chips are down. These nations total 540,000,000 people. On this most optimistic count the odds now favor the Kremlin by 5 to 3.

The responsibility for this disastrous change rests solely on you and your advisers.

This bill of particulars details but a few of the decisive errors that brought us from unconditional victory to almost unconditional danger. After 5 years of vast tribute to ally and defeated enemy alike, we find ourselves fighting alone in Korea, except for the South Koreans, whom you and Secretary Acheson spurned in your joint statements of January 5 last. The offer of three divisions by the Republic of China, which you spurned in the same statement, was rejected by Secretary Acheson July 1.

4. The chain of decisions and events that have brought us to war in Korea, under the most unfavorable circumstances, are fully set forth in a 40-minute speech by Congressman WALTER JUDD, in the House, July 27, 1950.

5. Every official State Department study has found that the Soviet regime was (a) a ruthless tyranny; and (b) not to be trusted to carry out any agreement. Yet on June 10, 1950, in your foreign-policy speech at St. Louis you said: "We had hoped that our wartime ally, the Soviet Union, would join in the efforts of the whole community of nations to build a peaceful world," and "we are closer to world peace now than at any time in the last 3 years."

In making this statement you disregarded the exhaustive official studies of the Communist dictatorship made by your Government. The first of these studies was made and published by Robert Lansing, Secretary of State for Woodrow Wilson, whose heir you are. In his letter of transmittal, dated October 27, 1919, Secretary Lansing said: "The purpose of the Bolsheviks is to subvert the existing principles of government and society the world over, including those countries in which democratic institutions are already established. They have built up a political machine, which by a concentration of power in the hands of a few and by the ruthlessness of its methods, suggests the Asiatic despotism of the early Tsars."

The following year, under President Wilson's last Secretary of State, Bainbridge Colby, another study was made and published. Based on it, Secretary Colby wrote a public letter to the Italian Ambassador stating why we would not recognize the Bolshevik regime in Russia. Dated August 10, 1920, he said: "The responsible leaders of that regime have frequently and openly boasted that they are willing to sign agreements and undertakings with foreign powers while not having the slightest intention of observing such undertakings or carrying out such agreements."

Further studies were made and published under succeeding Secretaries of State, all to the same effect, until 1933, when such reports were sealed, and it became our policy to present Bolshevik Czar Stalin as a benign individual, and the Bolshevik regime as a peace-loving democracy.

State Department personnel, who by years of study, had become authorities on Communist fifth columns throughout the world, and on Communist theory, plans and programs, were exiled to the far corners of the earth, or muzzled.

As recently as May 1, 1950, in a letter authorized by you, the State Department advised me that they had no use at this time for anyone who was informed on Communist theory, program or intentions, or who had been correct in warning you or the Nation of the developing crisis.

6. Charges of Communist activities made against officials have been met with unbelief or ridicule:

Sworn testimony and charges in Congress, involving Alger Hiss, Donald Hiss, Lee Pressman, Harold Glasser, Nathan Witt, John Abt, Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, Lauchlin Currie, Noel Field, Duncan Lee, Owen Lattimore, Michael Greenberg, Harry Dexter White, and innumerable others, have resulted only in the trial of Alger Hiss. The charges have been called "red herrings," and high Government officials have disgraced themselves by testifying for the accused, supposedly with your approval or at your request.

Beginning in 1944, when Alger Hiss was put in charge of United States activities in the UN, there has constantly been a strange assortment of persons soft to communism acting as representatives of the United States and as staff members. Small wonder that the UN, created ostensibly to enforce the peace, has been helpless in eastern Europe and in China, and could act in Korea only because of the temporary absence of Russia and our willingness to carry the burden.

More than 5 years ago, I gave the State Department information of Communist activities by certain officials. Previously, and since, I have given the FBI information and leads. According to the Tydings report, these were not even investigated. Were you serious when you asked your fellow citizens to report such information to the FBI, and then drop the matter?

Invariably, the administration seems to have rushed to the defense of the accused, refused access to the files, cleared the accused before hearing, investigated and smeared the accuser.

7. Names of 163 or 313 suspected spies furnished by Canada. No arrests: In 1945, Prime Minister Mackenzie King flew to Washington to present to you a report on the Gouzenko Soviet spy ring. It has been both reported and denied that he handed you a list of 150 such spies in the United States, which list had already been turned over to the FBI by the Royal Canadian police. Cabinet Minister Pearson confirmed that you were given 163 names of Americans connected with one of the Canadians arrested. In any case, not one was arrested, either of that list or of the cases developed by the Un-American Activities Committee. It was reported that the FBI had the evidence, but that the State Department refused to permit the arrests for fear of offending Russia.

8. Delivery of slave laborers and German POW's to Russia: A great mystery surrounds the delivery of 400,000 German POW's by us to the Russians, contrary to the Geneva Convention, to which we adhere. Do we have their names and records? Where are they now that Russia claims to hold no more Germans?

And what substance is there to the stories of hundreds of thousands of Russians returned forcibly to Stalin against their will and against all our humanitarian traditions?

For example, at Nordhausen about 40,000 Russian civilians worked in the enormous underground, air-conditioned V-2 rocket factory. These Russians were forcibly returned to Russia against their will and we then turned over the entire works, unscathed, to the Soviets, on their promise to dismantle and return the machinery to the various countries of manufacture, such as France, Czechoslovakia, and even Cincinnati, Ohio. Did the Russians carry out their promises, or are they still making V-2 rockets there?

9. Who stopped General Eisenhower's march on Berlin?

At that time our Ninth Army was not more than 30 miles from Berlin. With 11,000 combat effectives the Ninth Army held 65,000 German prisoners. Resistance had practically ceased. They could have been in Berlin the next day. Goebbel's sound trucks were notifying the Berliners to surrender to the Americans. The Russians were still 25 miles east of Berlin and didn't arrive until 10 days later. Who ordered our forces to retreat to the Elbe and leave Berlin for the Russians—a decision that has cost us so dearly since?

If General Eisenhower is the Republican and you are the Democratic nominee in 1952, each of you will have to charge that it was the other who issued the order to our victorious armies to back-track, to turn the Berlin sector over to the Russians, and put our necks in a noose there. It is perfectly apparent that the order for retreat was a sudden decision by you or General Eisenhower contrary to the previous orders given the generals rushing on Berlin. Why not now make public the orders then issued, instead of waiting until 1952?

10. Who stopped Georgie Patton 30 miles from Prague? In the Saturday Evening Post of April 17, 1948, Demaree Bess reported that Gen. Georgie Patton (pet hate of the Reds because he was the officer of the day who headed the detail from Fort Myer which dispersed the bonus campers in Washington in 1932) was ordered to halt his conquest of Czechoslovakia and to refuse the German surrender which had already been made by the German general to one of Patton's colonels. The fate of Czechoslovakia was sealed.

11. Why did we then turn the uranium mines over to Russia? Who ordered General Eisenhower, after the German surrender, to withdraw from already occupied western Saxony and Thuringia and turn them over to the Russians?

The area abandoned to the Russians is the industrially most valuable part of the present Soviet-occupied eastern Germany. Together with Jachymov in Czechoslovakia, which General Patton was ordered to evacuate, it contains some of the most valuable uranium deposits in the world. Without Czech-Saxon Erzgebirge, the Soviets would not have been able to produce an atom bomb by 1949. These turn-overs to Russia were ordered at a time when Russia had already broken the Yalta agreements of the previous February in Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Hungary, and even in Berlin, and was refusing us access to American POW's behind the Russian lines, some of whom, Counter-intelligence reports, are still held by the Russians.

12. Pro-Russian clique took over State Department in 1944–45: Under oath, before the Un-American Activities Committee August 30, 1948, Mr. Adolf Berle, former Assistant Secretary of State, and then and now chairman of the New Deal Liberal Party of New York State, testified: "In the fall of 1944 there was a difference of opinion in the State Department. * * * I was pressing for a pretty clean-cut showdown" (with the Russians) "then when our position was strongest.

The opposite group in the State Department was largely the men—Mr. Acheson's group, of course, with Mr. Hiss as his principal assistant. * * * I got trimmed in that fight and, as a result, went to Brazil and that ended my diplomatic career." Later, he referred to the Acheson group as the pro-Russian clique.

Mr. Berle could have named numerous others of his group who were forced out so that only the pro-Russian clique remained. The clique then named by Mr. Berle now runs our State Department.

13. The Acheson-Lilienthal Report: In 1946, the State Department presented a public report on the internationalization of the A-bomb. Called the Acheson-Lilienthal Report, it proposed the step-by-step release of all atomic data on the basis of an international agreement, made unenforceable by no restrictions on the veto in the UN Security Council. Fortunately, the Baruch Commission took a more realistic view of our peace-loving Soviet allies and provided for continuing inspection, free of the veto. Russia refused.

Reward for this proposed A-bomb gift to Russia by the Acheson-Lilienthal committee was chairmanship of the Atomic Energy Commission for Lilienthal, and Secretary of State for Acheson. Just to make it perfect, Philip C. Jessup, who, while still a Columbia professor in 1946, proposed we give the bomb to Russia while throwing our own stockpile in the ocean, was made Ambassador at Large and chief adviser on how to get along with the Russians, and now member of the Security Council, cleared for atomic secrets.

The original Atomic Energy Commission consisted of four men in addition to Chairman Lilienthal. Three of the four, and the first counsel of the Commission, were known as leftist liberals, hardly the qualifications for keeping out Soviet sympathizers and spies.

14. Sharing the A-bomb with Russia: As recently as last September, you again proposed to share the A-bomb with Russia, subject to certain promises. At that time Russia had a 100-percent record of broken promises to us, and to all the world. Do we still intend to trade the A-bomb for Russian promises?

15. H-bomb delay: The newspapers have reported that atom spy Fuchs had information on the H-bomb in 1945. Also, that our AEC is just now discussing a site for H-bomb development. The delay remains unexplained.

16. One of the unexplained puzzles was your proposal to send Justice Vinson to Moscow just before the election of 1948. It is reported that you intended him to be a latter-day Harry Hopkins to again woo Stalin. This idea was abandoned, according to Arthur Krock, only because the election campaign was on. The question arises: What countries was Justice Vinson authorized to sell out for another scrap of paper signed by Joe Stalin?

17. According to the Hoover Report we had the full equipment of 89 divisions at the end of the war. At the time of the report we had left only the equipment of 18 divisions. The larger part of this missing equipment was destroyed in Europe and the Pacific. In the copper trade it is believed that the largest copper deposit in the world is at the bottom of Pacific lagoons, where we dumped it. A very considerable part of the destroyed arms, planes, and ammunition is exactly what we now have to build all over again, both to arm our Atlantic pact allies and for ourselves. Americans who must work and pay for this, and troops at the front inadequately armed, are entitled to know who ordered that destruction.

18. Nine billion dollars spent on equipment since 1946: Having destroyed $35,000,000,000 of United States war equipment in Europe, we have spent something like $50,000,000,000 since 1946 on our Armed Forces. The results are not reassuring. Of this sum, only $9,000,000,000 was spent on new equipment. Whether we do or do not have any atom-bomb defense, or any warning network, either in being or planned, is another item that civilian defense officials have some right to know. Many believe that the Soviet spy network must have furnished this information to Moscow. If they know it, why shouldn't we?

19. Foreign aid wasted without military protection: Since 1945, under your direction, a sum exceeding $36,000,000,000 has been spent on various forms of foreign aid. Of this entire amount, scarcely $1,000,000,000 has been for military supplies or training for our supposed allies in case of war. You have been advised again and again that economic aid, in advance of military protection, was playing the Communist game. The results in Korea, where $440,000,000 of economic aid, and in China, where $1,500,000,000 of economic aid prior to military security was wasted, points up the wisdom of the rejected military advice.

A public statement, supplementing the private advice, was made to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, March 4, 1948, in connection with the proposed Marshall plan for Europe, by Deputy Chief of Staff, Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer. He said: "I have made the statement repeatedly that I do not believe that we should improve conditions politically, economically, or culturally in any area in the world without protecting such areas militarily, as long as there are forces in the world that unquestionably have for a policy the destruction of everything and everyone in opposition to their aggression." Rejection of this warning was cited as the cause of the Korean war by the ECA Director for Korea in the New York Times of July 15, 1950 (p. 3).

20. Marshall plan fattens the calf for slaughter: The Marshall plan was first proposed by Under Secretary Dean Acheson in a speech at Cleveland, Miss., in May 1947. The following month it was proposed by General Marshall at Harvard University. It was intended to include the U. S. S. R. and eastern Europe, as well as western Europe; the Soviet zone finally being left out only because Molotov refused to agree.

What could have better pleased the Kremlin than a $22,000,000,000 expenditure (the original amount) in Europe, to be divided between east and west, with not a single dollar of arms or ammunition? It would help fatten up Europe for the take-over, drive the United States toward bankruptcy and inflation, and force us to pare our own arms budget (as it did). Why Molotov rejected this handout is still a puzzle.

I suggest that you were mistaken last May when the State Department wrote me that you did not need anyone who was well informed on the Soviets.

21. American acquiescence in Red enslavement of Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia remains unexplained: It is believed that still unrevealed secret agreements of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam hold these mysteries. Continued secrecy cannot be explained on grounds of American security. It seems high time to get everything out in the open, reveal the errors, or worse, of the past and let the American people see where they've been and what they are headed for.

22. Somebody turned over to Russia the hundreds of Danube barges we held, just before the Danubian Conference met. This was our only trading point. Without it, at the conference, we were treated contemptuously, as could be expected.

23. Tito kills American fliers, War Minister Mikhailovich, and jails Archbishop Stepinac. We reward him. Until the recent erection, by public subscription, of a monument in Arlington Cemetery to the five American fliers shot down over Yugoslavia, their graves were covered with a slab reading: "Killed in airplane crash," which was untrue. Requests by the public committee to inscribe on the monument: "Shot down over Yugoslavia" were refused. For such activities Tito was given the gold store of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, vast UNRRA supplies, a steel mill, and $100,000,000 loan. After which he voted against us on Korea in the Security Council of the UN. No wonder Prime Minister Nehru said we treat our enemies better than our friends.

24. Another Korea has been prepared in western Germany. While the Soviets, contrary to agreements, are building an army in eastern Germany, we keep western Germany disarmed. When the east Germans attack, the situation will be even worse than Korea, for there will be no armed Germans to fight beside our two divisions in Germany and the east Germans should reach the Rhine in days or weeks unless the French and British come in force, as they have failed to do in Korea.

25. The defense effort in western Europe looks like a phony. As long as Italy, Germany, and Spain are excluded, western Europe is strategically incomplete. French and British armaments are woefully weak. Although the Soviets and their satellites have completely violated the disarmament stipulations of the peace treaties with Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria, we hold Italy to the six divisions, plus 200 light planes, of the peace treaty; we hold Germany to limited production, even after the vast dismantling which continued until 1948 in our zone and still goes on in the British; we are now preparing for more billions to France, Britain, Belgium, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries without any agreement for them to pull in their belts on welfare handouts, or even to remove the Communist sympathizers from high posts in their governments.

26. State Department pro-Sovietism caused the Berlin airlift. At Potsdam, in July 1945, it was agreed that our forces in Berlin would have a ground and air corridor from west Germany to Berlin. The State Department opposed getting this in writing from the Russians. The Air Force insisted and got the air corridor written in the agreement. The Army submitted. If the Air Force had been as weak as the Army, the Berlin airlift could not have come into existence. If the Army had insisted on its view, the airlift would never have been necessary. The State Department, somehow or other, is always found to be the Soviet's advocate.

27. Late in 1948 the UN met in Paris to attempt to settle the Berlin airlift and blockade. Ambassador Jessup asked the Chinese delegation, which had intended to vote with the United States, not to do so. This top mystery leaves unanswered the question of whom Ambassador Jessup really represented, as General Marshall was Secretary of State at the time.

At about the same time, in a memo to the State Department, Republican John Foster Dulles advised that Berlin be abandoned. Ambassador Jessup concurred. So seriously did the State Department regard this advice that General Clay deemed it advisable to fly to Washington to explain that the abandonment of Berlin in the face of Russian threats would be tantamount to the abandonment of western Europe.

Again in Paris, in 1949, at the meeting arranged by Jessup and Malik, which finally ended the airlift, Jessup fought for acceptance of the Russian terms. Once more Clay had to fight to stop it.

And now Clay is out and Dulles and Jessup are in.

28. The postwar Clay-Sokolovsky agreement providing for the return of Russian Army deserters from our zone of Germany was morally wrong and against American interest. It stopped an incipient anti-Communist movement in the Russian Army, it prevented us gaining valuable information and adherents for world war three, and presented the United States to European anti-Communists as the friend of communism and hence their enemy. This same agreement was forced on General MacArthur in Japan and Korea, where smaller numbers of Russian Army deserters were handed back at the border to be executed.

It is reported that in 1948 emissaries from a Russian armored division in East Germany came to General Clay and offered to march over with full equipment if we would receive them. General Clay was ordered to refuse and to hand the emissaries back to the Russians at the zonal border. Would you now refuse such an offer if made?

29. We were hardly established in Berlin before our zone was the scene of nightly snatches by Russians. When they were caught by our MP's they were brought to command posts. If the Russian was smart enough to charge that the German "snatchee" was wanted for some imagined crime in the east zone, the Russians were permitted to take the German across the boundary. No legal formalities were complied with. This continued for at least 2 years.

30. At the Nuremberg war-crimes trials the Germans were accused of the massacre of 10,000 Polish officers in Katyn Forest. At the demand of the Russians no evidence was introduced, yet at the end of the trials the Germans were not acquitted of this particular charge. Meantime our G–2 collected the evidence of this Katyn massacre. It is still kept secret. A committee headed by former Ambassador Arthur Bliss Lane collected evidence and presented it in outline at a press conference in New York. The Voice of America refused to carry the item in its news broadcast on the ground that it might arouse hatred of the Russians in Poland. This is the continuance in 1950 of the appeasement of Russia in Poland, which began at Tehran in 1943 and was made conclusive in 1945, when we abandoned the Yalta agreement for a Polish government jointly formed of the Polish London government-in-exile and the Communists. According to the Harry Hopkins papers, this was a deliberate betrayal, Hopkins saying he had no interest in getting the recognized London Polish government-in-exile into the new Government of Poland. We agreed to accept, instead, the Communist government, plus one of the London Polish leaders with no authority. After the sell-out we prematurely withdrew recognition from the London government and made stateless refugees of the Polish troops who fought beside us at Cassino and elsewhere.

31. Ninety million dollars given Red Poland: After the Polish Communist Government had scornfully rejected America's request for the free elections pledged at Yalta, and refused our Ambassador permission to visit Americans in jail there, Under Secretary Acheson approved a $90,000,000 loan over the protests of Ambassador Lane. Mr. Acheson's law firm acted as the agent of the Polish Government. Part of this money went to arm the dreaded secret police.

32. Dean Acheson discards Kingdom of Yugoslavia in favor of Tito: On December 22, 1945, Dean Acheson, as Acting Secretary, recognized Tito's Yugoslavia in place of our ally and cosigner of the declaration of the UN, the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. In the agreement of Yalta it was provided that free elections were to be held. None was. Mr. Acheson's act seems to fall into the definition of a war crime, as defined at Nuremberg.

33. Dean Acheson welcomes the Red Dean of Canterbury:

November 14, 1945, on the platform at Madison Square Garden with the Red Dean of Canterbury and pro-Communists Corliss Lamont, Paul Robeson, Albert Fitzgerald, and former Ambassador Joe E. Davies, Dean Acheson said: "Never in the past has there been any place on the globe where the vital interests of the American and Russian people have clashed or even been antagonistic, and there is no objective reason to suppose that there should now, or in the future, ever be such a place. We understand and agree with them that to have friendly governments along her borders is essential both for the security of the Soviet Union and for the peace of the world."

Whatever one might think of poor little Russia faced by such unfriendly governments as Finland, Greece, Iran, South Korea, etc., Mr. Acheson's plea for friendship must have been heartening to Russia, but what does it reveal about Mr. Acheson?

Some believe that the words "friendly governments" were taken from the text of one of the still secret pacts of Potsdam, which tied our hands in China.

34. Averell Harriman of Yalta in the White House:

Your top adviser on how to push the Communist bigwigs out of the Czar's Kremlin back to the garrets of the European underground, from which they emerged in 1917, is Mr. Averell Harriman. Mr. Harriman has much pushing to do. As our Ambassador in Moscow, during the latter part of the war, he was either the architect, or at least chief draftsman, of our Soviet giveaway program. He it was who prepared the secret Yalta agreement giving the Far East to Russia. He brought this to Yalta and had it agreed to by President Roosevelt and Harry Hopkins in a 15-minute session with Stalin and Molotov, according to Secretary Stettinius. When the British learned of it later, it is reported, Eden urged Churchill to refuse to sign, but he said he couldn't fight both America and Russia, so gave in. I hope Mr. Harriman knows better now, but his education, and the development of his judgment, are too costly in American lives.

35. Other top foreign-policy advisers with small qualifications are:

Under Secretary Webb, with no apparent foreign affairs background; Deputy Under Secretary Rusk, best known as author of a book on the subject of improved curricula for girls' colleges, protégé of Alger Hiss; Philip C. Jessup (friend and witness for Hiss, long-time associate of Frederick Vanderbilt Field, T. A. Bisson, Edward C. Carter, Owen Lattimore, Harriett Lucy Moore, Philip A. Jaffe and Guenther Stein), editor of the China white paper and protagonist of Red China; John Foster Dulles, a gentleman of the highest reputation, whose lack of discernment led him to place Alger Hiss as president of the Carnegie Endowment for Peace, and now has led him to replace Mr. Hiss with Hiss's former top assistant in the State Department; and Wm. T. Stone, protector of Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, overlord of the pinko Voice of America and now State Department member of the new National Psychological Strategy Board in which (New York Times, August 18, 1950) the State Department will be the center of authority.

36. Richard J. H. Johnston, reporting from Korea, quotes a GI at the battle front as saying: "Damned if I know why I'm fighting to save this hellhole." (New York Times, August 13, 1950, p. 1.) The answer, of course, is because your State Department refused arms to the South Koreans for their defense; confining them to small arms suitable only for internal security. This is the same policy followed in China where our GI's may soon be asking the same question about that twenty-times bigger hellhole. There has never been any shortage of Koreans or Chinese to fight on our side.

Mr. President, why have we preferred to use armed Americans unfamiliar with the country and unaccustomed to living under native conditions, instead of giving arms to the anti-Communist native forces? And, why do we still continue that policy?

37. Withdrawal of General Hodge's forces from Korea in 1948–49: Had our occupation of Korea continued, the Americans who landed in Korea last June would have had bases, supplies, and equipment at hand. Hodge's withdrawal and your January 5, 1950, statement were open invitations to the Reds to attack. Your change of attitude June 27th was sound, but we have a right to know who advised you to change. There was no secret about North Korean intentions to attack after we withdrew. It was openly predicted by our military in Japan; and our Korean occupation officers, heading for home last year, some via Europe and some via the Pacific, spread the word everywhere. Just last Sunday night, Ambassador Jessup said we still have no policy in Korea, but will leave it to decision by the 53 nations who voted with us in the UN.

38. MacArthur ordered to favor the Communists: One of the least understandable of the variety of cockeyed orders sent to General MacArthur by the State Department was the order, still in effect, certifying the Communist Party of Japan as one of the democratic parties to receive official encouragement. General MacArthur has been denied authority to act against that party so that, even today, with Korean Communists shooting Americans in the back, General MacArthur cannot take action against Japanese Communists as such.

39. China, key to Asia:

In spite of public warning by leading world statesmen that China held the key to the peace of the world, you have treated that vast and potentially powerful ally as though it were only a useful tidbit to appease the voracious appetite of the Red Czar, whom you hoped would "join in the efforts of the whole community of nations to build a peaceful world."

In 1899, in proclaiming the open-door policy, now sunk without trace, Secretary of State John Hay said: "Whoever understands China • • • has a key to politics for the next 500 years."

Lenin and Stalin both stressed that the turning point in the world revolution would come when China was conquered by communism.

In an address to the Politburo of the American Communist Party, published in part in the Daily Worker of December 2, 1945, W. Z. Foster, party chairman, said: "The war in China is the key to all problems on the international front."

A few days later you sent Gen. George C. Marshall to China to push that country into a coalition with the Communists, which you described, 3 years later, as "the same thing as a Communist government."

Innumerable warnings have pressed in on you, but you seem adamant in your determination, continued even today in your orders to the Seventh Fleet, to throw China to the Russian wolves. Most important of these warnings came from Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who, adding to his private warnings, said publicly in March 1948: "I can say, without the slightest hesitation, that a free, independent, peaceful, and friendly China is of profound importance to the peace of the world and to the position of the United States."

40. The key is thrown away: By a series of acts of commission and omission, some of which are detailed below, China was delivered over to Soviet power. Stuart Symington, on July 28, said our greatest shortage was manpower. China is the world's greatest reservoir of manpower. Physically, and intellectually, the equals, or the superiors, of the Koreans, we have seen what they can do when well-trained, well-led, and well-armed. Five hundred million Chinese turned over to Russia tipped the manpower balance in her favor. It is not yet too late, however, 500,000 troops under Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa, and 1,500,000 Nationalist guerrillas now fighting on the mainland, could be armed and trained to reconquer a Communist China, seething with revolt and dissatisfaction.

41. Secretary Acheson's sudden interest in China:

In 1943, Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson, who had been brought into the Department in 1941, as liaison with Congress, suddenly took a profound interest in China, where he has never been. Beginning that summer, his initials appeared frequently on the blue archive copies of messages to China. These initials show the identity of the person preparing the message, which is itself signed with the name of the Secretary or Acting Secretary, who, however, seldom sees it. Among his China activities was the preparation of General Marshall's instructions, and a message to Ambassador Hurley instructing him to follow Henry Wallace's report on China as policy guide, thenceforth.

The beginning of Mr. Acheson's interest in China coincided with the Soviet break with the Polish Government in April 1943; the secret Lattimore letter to Joseph Barnes, of June 1943; and the Jessup-IPR blast at Chiang Kai-shek and praise of the Chinese Communists as pure democrats and agrarian reformers, in July 1943. When the Soviet line on China changed from pro-Chiang to anti-Chiang, Acheson suddenly became interested.

Mr. Acheson's continuing interest in China was expressed in the embargo on arms to Chiang Kai-shek; the issuance of the White Paper on China, which served the double purpose of denouncing Chiang (though strangely it made no single charge of bad faith against him) and revealing our bad faith to every chancellory in the world. Mr. Acheson's championing of the Hiss brothers, of Harold Glasser, another of the same network, of Lattimore and Jessup and Barnett and Hanson and Service and others may be a tribute to his compassionate regard for sinners fallen into evil ways, but it discredits him as the guardian of our security.

42. Lauchlin Currie countermands the Joint Chiefs of Staff: After VE-day, the Chinese applied for surrendered German arms and ammunition. The Joint Chiefs of Staff approved, sent orders to General Eisenhower and 20,000 rifles actually left a German port for China, via India. The Joint Chiefs order was then countermanded by Presidential order signed by Lauchlin Currie, Administrative Assistant (since named by both Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley). The balance of the vast stores of German armament was then destroyed; by whose orders is unknown.

43. China's reserve ammunition destroyed: At the time of VJ-day, 39 Chinese divisions had been partially, or wholly, equipped with American arms. Ammunition in China was limited, but vast stores, all provided under lend-lease, lay in India awaiting shipment by air over the Hump, or by truck over the Stilwell Road. By somebody's order, all this vast store was destroyed and none recredited to Chinese lend-lease account. The amount destroyed is uncertain, except that smaller caliber ammunition was blown up in dumps in India and larger caliber (amounting to 120,000 tons) was taken to sea and dumped in the Bay of Bengal. In the Indian operation, it is reported, 25 Americans and 125 Indians lost their lives in accidents.

For lack of this ammunition, China's best 39 divisions were never able to undertake continuous field operations against the Communists, but had to husband remaining ammunition for defense of fixed points. This was made certain by an American and British embargo applied against ammunition export licenses to China, from December 1945 until about October 1948.

44. Chinese Reds kill Americans with impunity: Between the Japanese surrender, and VJ-day, small American intelligence forces behind Japanese lines in China were ambushed by Chinese Communists. This continued at intervals after VJ-day, under varying circumstances, until our forces withdrew. No apologies or reparations were ever obtained, and urgent requests from United States commanders in China and from fleet commanders (under whose orders the Marines were acting) failed to bring authority to take punitive action. Even when the Chinese Reds took to beating and jailing our diplomats, in 1949–50, the State Department continued to favor them.

45. State Department circumvented your orders for surplus arms to China: In March 1948 after congressional clamor, surplus arms and ammunition lying in the Pacific islands were ordered made available to China, then desperately short of ammunition for American arms previously supplied. Prior to the issuance of this public order, I am informed, a secret order went to Tokyo to classify as surplus only unserviceable material. When the Chinese arrived, they managed to get a little serviceable ammunition because the officers in charge, having a better sense of reality than the State Department's FLC, let their consciences be their guide in deciding what was unserviceable. Today, with your guaranty to Formosa in effect, there is a shortage of ammunition there. If not promptly remedied, it may cause the fall of Formosa, requiring American landings not necessary if we give the Chinese the wherewithal to fight.

46. The American Navy ordered to run away: Four times the American Navy has been ordered to withdraw from legally entered ports, when faced with Chinese Communist threats. Three such withdrawals occurred in late 1945 (at Dairen, Chefoo, and Hulutao), the fourth at Shanghai in 1949. Why we ran away from the Communists in China when they were weak and then went in to fight them in Korea, when they were strong, is explained by your turn from appeasement to strength, which we all approve. Too bad you didn't act on Churchill's advice in Fulton, Mo., in 1946, while the arms destruction program was still underway and could have been halted, and before Russia had the A-bomb.

47. Henry Wallace wrote our China policy: Ever since the Henry Wallace reports on China, cabled from Kunming and New Delhi in June 1944 and delivered to President Roosevelt in July 1944, the theme song of American policy in China has been the tune of "Chiang must go." Even the recall of General Stilwell was recommended by Mr. Wallace. In 1948, spending 2 days in China, Paul Hoffman wrote and signed a letter to Chiang Kai-shek advising him to resign. He did not mail it, but news of it became common gossip, and Mr. Hoffman told a friend, after his return, he regretted not mailing it. Yet, in all these years, your administration has never dared name a possible successor to Chiang Kai-shek. They knew there was only one possibility, and that his name was Mao Tse-tung, but they never had the courage to say it openly. Why not make the Wallace reports public? In his book, Soviet Asia Mission (1946), Mr. Wallace said: "As we began to talk about details, it became apparent that President Roosevelt had much more than China in mind. He urged me to take Owen Lattimore with me, who, he said, was one of the world's great experts on the problems involving Chinese-Russian relationships."

48. High policy China papers still secret: Last fall, Secretary Acheson wrote two letters, one to the then President Li Tsung-jen of China, and one to Chiang Kai-shek. They are still secret. May we not know why? Also all cables from President Roosevelt to Chiang Kai-shek and vice versa; and the 12 coded messages called for by Ambassador Hurley when before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate in November 1945. The Chinese, of course, have these messages; in the Amerasia case, John S. Service revealed he had turned some over to Philip Jaffe. Mr. President, are not the American people entitled to this information?

49. Arms for the Chinese Communists: Proposals were made in 1944 by General Stilwell, Vice President Wallace, and the State Department to arm the Chinese Communists with American arms. Actual implementation of these proposals in 1945 and the proposal to Congress by Under Secretary Acheson in March 1946 to arm both Communists and Nationalists, suggest a complete report on this whole subject.

50. John S. Service's testimony before Senator TYDINGS hinted at a conspiracy.

But the facts did not come out. In April 1945 the State Department proposed that the planned American landings on the China coast be shifted from the sandy beaches of Nationalist-defended Hangchow Bay, far to the north in the Communist area; and that 300,000 Communists be armed and trained by us. The Navy rejected the plan for tactical reasons.

In July General Stilwell, then in command on Okinawa, renewed this plea. Again it was scotched. The Japanese surrender in August ended that plot. Had it succeeded, the conquest of China by the Reds would have been advanced by 2 or 3 years. The Tydings committee covered this up.

51. Suppression of the Wedemeyer report from August 1947 to August 1949: Had the Wedemeyer report been implemented, communism would have lost in China, and there would have been no war in Korea. The continued suppression of the Korean section of the Wedemeyer report may hide another skeleton in the closet. Did Wedemeyer warn you?

52. Why do we fight alone in Korea?

At the very beginning of the Korean fighting the Chinese Nationalists offered three of their eight American-equipped divisions for immediate service in Korea and the ships to transport them. The State Department refused this offer. To date, no other member of the UN has delivered a single unit of ground troops to Korea, though some may be en route. Our boys die there alone. Parents ask why Chinese allies were rejected and also why volunteers at American embassies in every country of western Europe are turned away with a printed notice reading: "The United States Government does not accept the enlistment of foreigners outside the United States." Both may be sound policy, but parents would appreciate an explanation.

Should the balance of the South Korean forces collapse, the refusal of Chinese divisions will leave us fighting a race war in Korea, as now charged in Communist propaganda. White against yellow is a picture that would turn most of the 1,000,000,000 people of East Asia against us.

53. Everywhere, Mr. President, we have sought to make our enemies into friends by treating our friends as enemies. The free governments of Poland and Yugoslavia in exile and the people of those two countries were our friends. We treated them as our enemies and turned them over to communism. The people and Government of the Republic of China were our friends. As General Marshall said, "By a stroke of the pen [the embargo] I disarmed them" and step by step turned that vast "depot" of manpower over to communism. President Quirino, of the Philippines, proposed an anti-Communist Asiatic alliance in July 1949, came to Washington, was told to "lay off," and dropped the idea. Only 4 months ago leaders of your administration proposed a $10,000,000,000-a-year bribe to the Soviets for another piece of paper calling for 50 years of peace on promises of disarmament by Russia and real disarmament by us.

Last year a Republican political leader told me that communism was not a political issue. "It's like VD," he said; "everybody's against it, but nobody wants to talk about it." Be-cently he told me that the only issue in this campaign was "Korea." I reminded him of what he said last year. "That was right," he said, "but now we've got it."

How true: "Red herring" poultices, "let the dust settle" and "won't turn my back on Alger Hiss" palliatives will no longer serve. Drastic surgery and informed medication by competent doctors are called for. The quacks, who have a record of 100 percent wrong guesses, should go. The bad medical advice you have taken should be discarded. New advisers and new remedies are urgent before the present bleeding drains our strength.

54. It took a genius to lose the cold war:

It took hundreds of wrong decisions to reduce you to the necessity of calling for help to challenge a scarcely fifth-rate Soviet satellite. It took scores of wrong decisions to bring about the conquest of one-third the world in the last 5 years, without the shedding of a drop of Russian blood. And, all by a punch-drunk Soviet Union which had seen half its European territory ravaged, 20,000,000 of its sons and daughters slain, and 1,000,000 of its army in revolt at the end of World War II.

It took genius in reverse to lose our war (call it cold, or call it hot) with the Soviets. This is proven by the unbelief 5 years ago that it could possibly happen. It is proven by our postwar offers of aid, at least until Russian rejection of the Marshall plan. It is proven by our still continuing offers to share the atom bomb. Russia claims (correctly) 830,000,000 people behind the iron curtain, yet, also only claims 18,000,000 Communists there. The State Department and Voice of America "pinkos" have been losing the cold war, where the odds are heavily on our side. Now they are getting us into a hot war where the odds are heavily against us. It doesn't take a genius to figure that out.

55. J. Peters, Gerhardt Eisler, Adams (or Adamson), and John Santo were four of Russia's top espionage agents in the United States of America: After this was known to our authorities, Eisler and Adams were permitted to escape, and Peters and Santo were permitted to leave voluntarily. Information, such as we are now obtaining from British spy Fuchs, and American spy Gold, might have been obtained from these four, if jailed here.

56. In your broadcast to the country July 19, you quoted Chief of Staff J. Lawton Collins, as reporting that "our far eastern forces were organized and equipped primarily to perform peaceful occupation duties in Japan."

The Eighth Army, and other forces that occupied Japan, were heavily armed for the campaigns in the Pacific islands; and prepared for the landings on the Chinese and Japanese coasts. If they left all that armor behind, as reported by General Collins, who induced you to permit its destruction? Wouldn't it be useful in Korea? Might it not be useful if the Russians attacked us in Japan?

57. In spite of the killing and wounding, without apology or reparations, of more than 100 Americans by the Chinese Communists; in spite of the beating and jailing of your representatives (our consuls in China), in spite of daily abuse of America and you by the Chinese Communist press and radio, last September 29, Ambassador Philip C. Jessup, in an interview in the Pathfinder magazine, recommended the recognition of Red China. Recently, you appointed him to the Security Council. His is not the advice your countrymen wish to follow.

58. Behind the fantastic insults you stand for almost daily in the UN, State Department fat cats, such as the Washington Post, United States News, Walter Lippmann, and Drew Pearson hint at appeasement of the Chinese and Korean Communists, to restore peace. Parents, whose captured sons had their hands tied and were shot in the face, want punishment, not appeasement, of Communists in Korea and elsewhere.

59. Why do we hesitate to arrest the Axis Sallys and Tokyo Roses of this war? Poison, more sinister than the treason of these American Fascist broadcasters of World War II, is broadcast daily in the Communist Daily Worker, People's World, and Political Affairs and at hands-off-Korea meetings. America is denounced; our sons are accused of wanton slaughter of peaceful Koreans; we are accused as aggressors. To make it complete, you are denounced as a tool of Wall Street. The fulminations of Kim Il Sung, head of the North Korean Government, are printed. Even denunciations of America, lyingly attributed to captured officers by name, are printed. Treason was not condoned in World War II. Why now?

60. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 4, 1950, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, your ardent supporter, said: "American occupation forces were withdrawn from South Korea in July 1949. * * * Again, we miscalculated and failed to understand the menace of the Communist conspiracy." Mr. President, your advisers have failed to understand this menace, at home and abroad, again and again. Of this bad advice Americans have had enough.

61. Why doesn't the FBI trust the State Department?

The reasons for this distrust are apparent to those who have watched the records of hearings before the Un-American Activities Committee, the Tyding committee, and others. One incident is the FBI report in 1946, which was put in chart form by the State Department and introduced in the Senate by Senator MCCARTHY. The story back of this is that the FBI material was turned over to the State Department Office for Visual Presentations. The head of that office was Carl Aldo Marzani, later sentenced to jail as a Communist.

Another instance concerns the file on Nathan Silvermaster (member of Elizabeth Bentley's and Whittaker Chambers' spy rings), who testified that William T. Stone, his superior, showed him the FBI record. Mr. Stone has since been promoted to a high State Department position.

Another was the instance in which this same Silvermaster was cleared by Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson after a derogatory report by G-2. This was supposedly on request of Lauchlin Currie, who saw the file, and who, himself, was later named by both Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley.

In each of these cases the sources of FBI information were revealed to a Communist, who might be expected to report to the Communist Party; thus possibly spoiling FBI sources of information.

From what I hear, the FBI has no more confidence in the State Department than do Americans generally.

62. To close this bill of particulars with a constructive suggestion, I attach a reprint of a portion of my testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee, June 10, 1948. I hope you will find these proposals, in spite of their brevity, worthy of consideration. They are not original, but represent the conclusions of many of the few Americans who may properly be considered authorities on communism. Instead of leaving the initiative with the Soviets, as does the present policy of partial containment, it proposes that we seize the initiative, arm our fighting friends and give men everywhere the opportunity to fight for freedom, if they have the will. Like most worth-while proposals, it starts at home.

If you are not longer committed to the road to disaster we have followed for the last 5 years, I hope you will give it serious consideration.

ALFRED KOHLBERG.

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 30, 1950.

CHINA AID PROGRAM

(Portion of statement of Alfred Kohlberg, New York City)

More than 2½ years ago the last of our enemies in World War II surrendered unconditionally. Never in the history of the Republic had the United States won so complete a victory; all other foreign wars in our history having been settled by peace treaties and not by unconditional surrender. During these 2½ years President Truman, with the assistance of three different Secretaries of State, has so completely lost the peace in Europe, in the Near East, in Korea, in China, and almost everywhere in the Far East, that I find our people turning almost in resignation to the thought of a third world war as a corrective for these errors. Since my return from China and Japan in March, I have been frequently asked, "How did we get into our present mess?" "Is it because of stupidity or was it treason?"

In the past 3 years this Congress has been rushed from one world-saving emergency measure to another. Each, at the time, was guaranteed to win the peace, save the world, and prevent world war III. These were Bretton Woods, $7,000,000,000; UNRRA, $3,500,000,000; UNO, a few million; the British loan, $3,750,000,000; post UNRRA aid, $350,000,000; the peace treaties with Italy and three satellites, Greek-Turkish aid, $400,000,000. I might also mention the $500 00,000 Export-Import Bank loan to China held in front of the Chinese horse like a carrot, while the stick of coalition with the Communists was vigorously applied by General Marshall on the spot. When the stick failed, the $500,000,000 carrot was canceled.

Each of these measures was put through in a frenzy of enthusiasm. Each has failed. It is time now to look this latest horse coldly in the mouth and put some check rein on it so that it does not go dashing off wildly in all directions and end up nowhere, like UNRRA, Bretton Woods, the UN, and so forth, before it.

CONFUSED AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

The American public is confused by an apparent policy of stumbling from one step to another, and from one emergency to another, in an unplanned attempt to contain Soviet Communist expansion everywhere in the world. Our armed services are in direct contact with Communist armies in too many places, in Germany, in Austria, in Greece, in Trieste, in Korea, in North China, and on the thin water barriers between Siberia and Alaska and between the Kuriles and Japan. We fear that incidents may result in an unintended war.

Only by turning these points of contact into outposts of unity and confronting the Communist world with a closely knit free world too strong to attack, can peace be preserved. To accomplish this, may I suggest the following steps now. Some of these steps can be written into your appropriation bill, some would need other legislation.

In their memoirs our recent leaders are now telling us that World War II could have been prevented had steps similar to these been taken at any time prior to 1939. The objectives of my proposals are:

One, to prevent world war III by destroying the Soviet fifth column and bringing into being an alliance of free people so overwhelming that world communism will not dare a military decision.

Two, while preventing the present cold war from becoming a shooting war, to destroy world communism from within.

While it is true that the conduct of our foreign relations is the constitutional prerogative of the President, the power of the purse remains with Congress. The signers of the Constitution probably never expected that it would cost $10,000,000 a year to conduct our foreign relations. It is my humble opinion that when the cash is appropriated you assume responsibility for results.

NATURE OF OPPOSITION TO DEMOCRACY

What we face is an ideology plus a force. This ideology promises socialism, economic democracy, miraculous medicine, free education, no more exploitation, racial equality, and every variety of pie in the sky. These ideas are for export only. Behind the iron curtain it delivers poverty, the police state, terror, and slavery.

The force is the Communist International, which includes the ever-expanding Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and musters 450,000,000 subjects and slaves, and millions of spies and agents all over the world.

It will destroy us or we will destroy it.

Force can be destroyed by force, but an ideology cannot be destroyed by force alone. It must be destroyed by a better ideology.

We have that better ideology. It is freedom—political freedom, religious freedom, and economic freedom.

I believe that every one of the steps which I am going to suggest is inevitable; that every one of them will in any case be taken the day after war comes; but that, if taken now or in the very near future, war may be avoided.

Step 1: Congress must declare that world communism has proclaimed the United States its enemy, and itself our enemy. This declaration that Communist hierarchy has officially made a number of times, most particularly in section 1, paragraph 1, of the constitution of the Communist International which proclaims its objectives to be to fight for the establishment of a World Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, that is for the conquest of the entire world. In accordance with this declaration, adhering to, giving aid and comfort to world communism would fall under the constitutional definition of treason.

Step 2: Unrestricted trade relations shall be permitted only with nations entering the alliance outlined in step 3. Trade relations with Communist-controlled nations and areas shall be prohibited. Trade relations with other nations and areas shall be controlled so that no materials which may directly or indirectly promote the war potential of the Communist areas may thereby reach such areas.

Step 3: American armed aid in case of attack by armed Communists shall be promised to every nation taking the above action on condition that each such nation agrees to extend armed aid under the same circumstances to each of the others so qualifying. No question of the form of government of nations entering such an alliance, whether free enterprise, democratic, monarchial, dictatorial, socialistic, or otherwise shall be given consideration. When thinking of military alliances, we should remember that Russia signed a treaty of military alliance during the war with Great Britain to run 20 years.

Since the war she has signed treaties of military alliance with the following former allies of ours: Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and France; also with the following enemy nations: Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, and Finland, all, not long since, described as Fascist beasts. The alliance I envison would be independent of the UN which we would permit to continue in the hope of a happier day in the dim and distant future, at which time it could be reorganized to fit.

Step 4: American economic, charitable, relief, or reconstruction aid shall be permitted only to nations entering the alliance provided for in step 3.

Step 5: Direct military and other aid shall be supplied to dissident elements within the Communist world, exactly in the manner that Russia now supplies such aid to Communist and other dissidents in the free world, as, for example, in China, Korea, Greece, Trieste, Austria, Germany, Italy, Iran, Finland, the Philippines, and elsewhere.

Step 6: Diplomatic relations shall be immediately broken with all nations and areas within the Communist world. Such diplomatic relations in the past were presumed to smooth the course of international relations, but as now practiced by the Communist nations only serve to aggravate such relations. Only last April I returned from Japan where the Soviet Union has several hundred employees in its Tokyo Embassy. A few dozen are engaged in diplomatic work. The balance are busy at espionage, propaganda, agitation, and intrigue.

All these steps can be taken at once. No one of them is warlike, nor does any of them, except the rupture of diplomatic relations, go beyond the steps already taken by the Soviet communism in its cold war on us. Those who think we are now at peace with Russia must consider all these steps to peace; they exactly duplicate Russia's peaceful approaches to us. Those who think we are engaged in a cold war with Russia will applaud retaliation confined to the cold level.

Gov. THOMAS E. DEWEY,
Executive Mansion, Albany, N. Y.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I appeal to you as the titular head of the only loyal opposition party in the United States of America.

Six years ago last month I wrote to my old friend, your then campaign manager, Herbert Brownell. I secured his permission to make my letter, but not his answer, public, and enclose a copy. It is my intention, unless you object, to make this letter public.

Since 1944 the sell-out of China and Poland, predicted in my letter, has become fact. The Atlantic Charter and the four freedoms are long since forgotten.

We had two traditional foreign policies. The open-door policy, dating from 1899, was secretly abandoned at Yalta. The Monroe Doctrine, which President Monroe refused to make a consultative pact in 1823, was turned into just that at Chapultepec in 1945.

When I wrote Herb Brownell in 1944 the United Nations, formed January 1, 1942, was a hard and fast military alliance. The nations in it—our military allies—were the recognized governments for 1,690,000,000 human beings. Of these 190,000,000 were accounted for by the Soviets, whose government had been officially described by Woodrow Wilson's Secretary of State in 1919 as one that "suggests the Asiatic despotism of the early Tsars." The others, accounting for 1,700,000,000 people, were governments that ruled by consent of their people, attested in their several ways.

Today our allies and partial allies (western Europe, this hemisphere, South Korea, the Philippines, and the Anzacs) account for 580,000,000 people. Meantime the Soviets have increased to 830,000,000. Should war come, on a population basis, the odds against us are 8 to 5, whereas in 1944 they were 8 to 1 in our favor.

I trust you will pardon me as an older Republican for saying that under your leadership the Republican Party has been remiss in its duty to the country. It has failed to explain and denounce the combination of treason and incompetence that has brought us to the verge of disaster, now becoming so apparent in the hills and rice paddies of Korea. Your speech of November 23, 1947, on China and Korea was a classic and predicted exactly the very disaster that has now befallen us in both countries. But neither you nor the party carried through.

Korea is only a peninsula jutting out from Manchuria, sold out to the Communist slavecracy by Messrs. Harriman, Hiss, Hopkins, and Roosevelt at Yalta. Manchuria is only the three northeastern provinces of China, pledged to be restored to the Republic of China (not just China) at Cairo. The step-by-step sell-out of China, so well exposed in its naked infamy in the documents that make up the appendix of the State Department white paper, must be clear to every chancellery in the world who had experts study it, even if we did not. The white paper suppressed General Wedemeyer's report on Korea. Was this suppression treason, now being paid for in American lives?

However, I would not write you only to refer to past, though undenounced, treason.

I write because of what I now see ahead, just as I saw the Polish-Chinese double-cross in 1944. What I see is another Tehran, or Yalta or Potsdam (yes; or Munich), this time in the UN. A deal for Russia to order the North Koreans back to the thirty-eighth parallel in return for a Communist China on the Security Council; the cutting off of the armies on Formosa from further ammunition; a few Americans stationed in a ruined South Korea to await the next attack; the UN completely hamstrung by a double veto; and the whole Asian world told once and for all that the United States is a faithless ally and its promises made only to be broken.

I am not imagining this. The pro-Russian clique in the State Department (minus only Alger Hiss, on whom they "have not turned their backs") as described by New Dealer Adolph Berle, still controls our destiny. This coming infamy has been spelled out by their favorite grapevines, the Washington Post, Walter Lippmann, the United States News, and Robert S. Allen. They expect this peace to bring Truman as great an ovation as Munich brought Chamberlain and Daladier. They seem to agree with Hopkins that we are "too damned dumb" to understand.

Furthermore, they have contrived, by refusing to accept Chinese divisions, to present a picture of white imperialism fighting alone in South Korea, Indochina, and Malaya, against native Communist nationalism.

I think your two predecessors as titular heads of our party would concur in the above analysis except, possibly, for the charge of appeasement to come. Now that you have removed yourself from the political race, could you not join with them in a nonpolitical warning to our party and to the country?

President Hoover spoke out above party at the convention in 1948. In spite of the ovation accorded him the party and the country continued asleep. Both are now awakening. For the sake of God, of America, and what is left of the free world, I implore you to speak out now.

Very sincerely,

ALFRED KOHLBERG.

SPRING LAKE, N. J., June 28, 1944.
Hon. HERBERT BROWNELL, Jr.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR HERB: It is my observation that there are very few citizens whose votes can be changed by arguments based on domestic issues. All who will listen to common sense and reason are already anti-New Deal. The rest have closed their minds and ears and cannot be reached.

However, the vast majority are completely at sea on foreign policy and are completely open to explanation and reason, as they have only the vaguest idea of what it is all about, how this war happened, how we stumbled into it and how to avoid stumbling into a bigger world war III in another generation—possibly almost before World War II is completely over.

Bad as Roosevelt's domestic record is, his foreign record is worse. What saves him is that the Republican record of the past few years is even worse. But Dewey's record is not and he is not bound by the record of Republicans who did not hold national policy making offices—the last Republican record binding him at all is the record of the Harding, Coolidge, Hoover administrations.

Before going to China in 1938, 1939, and 1941, I was told by high State Department officials that the foreign policy of the United States of America was not made by the State Department and not by the President, but by public opinion. Not only is that conception unconstitutional, it was untrue, and in the final analysis it was disproven when the ultimate foreign policy decision—the decision of peace or war—was made not by the State Department, the President, the Congress, or public opinion, but by Mr. Hirohito.

Now in the seventh year of the war in China, the fifth year of the war in Europe and our third year in the war, Roosevelt's only pronouncement (3 weeks ago) is to reestablish the proven failure of the bankrupt League of Nations, practically without change.

Meantime, he has bypassed his Secretary of State to sell out Poland, and maybe France, and maybe China to the U. S. S. R. These deals are not provable now but may be before election. There is circumstantial evidence now. (There may be leaks from China as to Wallace's demands.)

All this only deepens the confusion of the average man. What is needed now is a clear statement of America's interest and then a clear policy to preserve that interest.

Our fundamental interest is clear and simple. It is to prevent the establishment of any superstate anywhere in the world so big and powerful that we would always have to be armed to the teeth in fear of attack by it.

One hundred and twenty years ago President Monroe acted to prevent such a state from developing as our neighbor in this hemisphere. Today such a state anywhere in the world would be nearer to Washington than Mexico was in Monroe's time (in point of time). A Europe under one power, or an Asia under one power, or both under one power, would be a threat so great that we could never return to the normal ways of peace.

An extension of the Monroe Doctrine to the world is called for. The world is relatively smaller today than the Americas were in Monroe's time, and we are bigger, relatively. Furthermore, it is in the Republican tradition—the tradition that warned Spain in Monroe's time and penalized her for criminality in McKinley's; that proclaimed the open door policy in China in McKinley's time and aided in ending Russian aggression in Roosevelt's; that pledged the territorial integrity and independence of China in 1922; and refused to countenance Japanese in Manchuria under Hoover. Furthermore, it would clarify and give substance to the foreign policy plank of the platform adopted in Chicago yesterday.

I have drawn it up roughly in the enclosed "Proclamation." This could be greatly improved in many ways, particularly as I do not have the Monroe Doctrine here with me on my vacation. This, however, represents many years of thinking, study, and travel; and after discussions with a former State Department official and Republican Minister to Hungary 3 years ago was drawn up in a different form at that time. (Copy enclosed.)

In the present form it has been seen by no one but my secretary. If it proves to have any points of interest, I would be glad to discuss it with any of your advisers. I shall be back in New York shortly.

It is many years since Ward and you and I have been together, but I have watched your career and your increasing success with great pleasure.

Sincerely yours,

ALFRED KOHLBERG.

Too Slow, Too Short

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD an editorial, Too Slow, Too Short, that appeared a few days ago in the Washington Daily News. I am in agreement with the argument set forth in this editorial that the United States, even though we have greatly increased our defense expenditures and are now making a greater effort to prepare this Nation for the danger of war, is still not doing enough. I would call particular attention to these statements:

Defense spending will be doubled to a rate of thirty billion a year by next June, the President said, and to a much higher rate the year thereafter.

But next June is 9 months in the future, whereas the danger the free world faces is here and now, and there is every reason to believe that it grows by the hour.

Russia's rulers, we may be sure, are not dilly-dallying. They are forcing their subjects to utmost exertion to maintain and widen their margin of military superiority and, especially, to overcome what we fondly trust is our lead in production and stockpiling of atomic bombs.

America's one chance of winning the fateful race is to get her unexcelled industrial machine to work at top speed on production of planes and tanks and ships and guns and other weapons—not after months or years, but now.

In that is our only hope of deterring Russian aggression and bringing peace to the world. In that is our best hope of survival if we are forced to fight a third world war.

The American people will give what it takes. They cannot be safe or satisfied with less than an all-out effort by their Government.

Mr. President, the time has come when the United States should make an all-out effort to prepare for the danger of war. If we make an all-out effort and we are able to keep the peace, then we can feel sure that the great effort and the expenditures made by this Nation succeeded in giving us peace for many years to come. If we make this enormous effort and we are later forced to fight a war, then we can feel that we did the wise thing and had our Nation in position that it would be able to survive with liberty and freedom. Nevertheless, it is time we understand that the hour is late, the time to be ready is now, not a year from now.

I regret, Mr. President, that this great Nation was not sufficiently alarmed or awakened by the Berlin blockade. Then was the time when we should have been completely on notice that Soviet Russia did not have peaceful intentions. Then was the time when we should have immediately undertaken to see that we would not be outmatched, outproduced, outgunned in a war of survival. Oh, Mr. President, how unfortunate we are that America was not sufficiently awakened or alarmed by the Berlin blockade.

History may record that it was still more unfortunate that the American people again went to sleep at the switch in international affairs within 1 year of the lifting of the Berlin blockade. While Russia was preparing as rapidly as possible the American public was again demanding reduction in defense expenditures, and our Secretary of Defense was making himself popular over the Nation by refusing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars which Congress had appropriated for defense. Let us hope and pray that we have been sufficiently awakened in Korea and that we will profit from the lessons of Korea and the American lives that are being lost there. If this great Nation had undertaken immediate and rapid preparedness for war at the time of the Berlin blockade and had continued it until the present date, we might be reasonably sure we would not be losing the lives of our finest men in Korea today. Let us hope that we will not lose hundreds of thousands of additional lives and possibly the freedom of all America and of the entire world by our failure to wake up to the danger in time.

Now is the time when we must put aside petty differences. Now is the time when we must cease arguing and bickering about differences and mistakes of the past. We must join together in a tremendous effort. I hope that the President and our new Secretary of Defense will lose no time in making clear to the American people the danger that we face and initiate a program of peace through preparedness. The democracies have tried to maintain peace in our time by appeasement, only to fight the most terrible war in all history. We can have peace when we are ready and able to win a victory for freedom. No American would want peace without liberty.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOO SLOW, TOO SHORT

"All of us—whether we are farmers, or wage earners, or businessmen—must give up some of the things we would ordinarily expect to have for ourselves and our families. The danger the free world faces is so great that we cannot be satisfied with less than an all-out effort by everyone."

Those words from President Truman to the American people are profoundly true.

And more surely than ever before, the free world's danger is our own country's imminent danger.

But the only Americans from whom the President thus far has demanded vital sacrifices and all-out effort are the hard-pressed, outnumbered men sent to fight in Korea.

The pay-as-we-go taxes and the other steps taken or proposed toward home-front mobilization, about which Mr. Truman talked Saturday night, are longer steps than he previously has seemed to consider necessary, and in the right direction.

But they still are steps too slow and too short.

If voluntary restraint and limited economic controls could prove effective in halting the disastrous spiral of inflation, as Mr.

Truman hopes, it would be for one reason only.

It would be because Mr. Truman's program of military mobilization and preparedness is inadequate and its strain on the economy would not be severe.

Defense spending will be doubled to a rate of $30,000,000,000 a year by next June, the President said, and to a much higher rate in the year thereafter.

But next June is 9 months in the future, whereas the danger the free world faces is here and now, and there is every reason to believe that it grows by the hour.

That danger will be lessened, Secretary of State Acheson said last night, and there will be a good chance for stability in the world and peace between East and West, when the Western Powers attain military equality with Russia.

This, Mr. Acheson explained, does not mean that the huge Soviet Army must be matched man for man or division for division.

What it does require is that the numerically smaller forces of the Western Powers must be better armed, better trained, and more ingenious than Russia's.

Meanwhile, Mr. Truman has approved proposals for a substantial increase of American troops in western Europe—troops which, if they are to be provided without weakening the war effort in Korea, must be called from civilian life, and trained and equipped.

And, meanwhile, our European allies look to America for increased aid in their own rearmament.

Russia's rulers, we may be sure, are not dilly-dallying. They are forcing their subjects to utmost exertion to maintain and widen their margin of military superiority and, especially, to overcome what we fondly trust is our lead in production and stockpiling of atomic bombs.

America's one chance of winning the fateful race is to get her unexcelled industrial machine to work at top speed on production of planes and tanks and ships and guns and other weapons—not after months or years, but now.

In that is our only hope of deterring Russian aggression and bringing peace to the world. In that is our best hope of survival if we are forced to fight a third world war.

The American people will give what it takes. They cannot be safe or satisfied with less than an all-out effort by their Government.

Pound Conversion Tied to Reserves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a dispatch from the New York Times of September 12, 1950, on the pound conversion being tied to the reserves.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POUND CONVERSION TIED TO RESERVES—BRITISH SAY $6,000,000,000 IN GOLD IS NEEDED FOR FREE EXCHANGE OF STERLING—ESTIMATE OF 1944 TRIPLED—WORLD BANK MEETING IN PARIS SEES HINT OF NEW PRESSURE BY UNITED STATES TO DROP CONTROLS

(By Michael L. Hoffman)

PARIS, September 12.—The British are letting word get around that Britain will need gold and dollar reserves of at least $6,000,000,000 before she can consider making pound sterling fully convertible.

This figure has been quietly suggested by leading British financial journalists, to members of the staff of the International Monetary Fund, and to financial bigwigs from the whole world gathered now in Paris for annual meetings of the fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Six billion dollars is nearly three and a half billion more than Britain has now, about the same amount above what she had when the Marshall plan started, and four billion above what in 1944 was regarded as a necessary minimum reserve for the sterling area. It is, in fact, such a big figure that no responsible financial expert here believes the British have any idea that they will reach it in the foreseeable future.

ANTICIPATE UNITED STATES PRESSURE

What, then, is the point of fixing the financial world's attention on that figure? The general explanation in United States circles here is that the British are anticipating renewed American pressure to drop their system of sterling area exchange and trade controls, the effect of which is to keep countries using or dependent on sterling substantially blocked off from the dollar-using world so far as commercial competition is concerned.

They are anticipating renewed pressure because of the fact that their gold dollar reserves have risen more than a billion dollars since devaluation and are still going up. Britain has indeed been banking more dollars than she has received from Marshall aid.

As their reserves pass all of the old landmarks, American experts say, the British know they will be asked increasingly why they cannot live up to their oft-repeated pledges, both contractual and unilateral, to make the pound again freely convertible currency in world trade. American experts anticipate precisely the same thing. But nobody on the United States side nor among continental experts here believes the British have any intention of making the pound convertible, no matter what pressures are brought to bear, because they now know by experience that in the last analysis the United States always gives in in such an argument.

BRITISH TRIAL BALLOON

The six billion figure is therefore in the nature of an advance patrol for the regiment of arguments the British will muster to prove why convertibility remains impossible under present circumstances. Among these are that although British dollar reserves are rising these reserves are largely mortgaged to other countries in the sterling area. Most of the increase the British avow comes from increased sales and high prices of sterling area raw materials.

The Bank of England gets dollars but Australia, Ceylon, New Zealand, and other sterling area countries get pounds which the British sooner or later have to cash. To cash them in the form of exports from Britain will get harder as the British military effort expands. Therefore Britain must hold reserves against possible claims for dollars and, by the same token, cannot permit this sterling to be freely converted into dollars until reserves reach an almost fabulous level.

Preponderant expert opinion here is that the British will never take the risk of establishing convertibility until the position of the pound as world trading currency is seriously threatened by its being inconvertible into dollars. Because of the large proportion of world trade conducted in pounds, of clever management by the Bank of England and United States aid—particularly through United States contribution to European Payments Union—no such threat has yet appeared.

American Medicine Must Remain Free

OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a very fine speech made by Dr. W. C. Caudill, president of the Virginia Medical Society, at the annual meeting of this organization in Roanoke, Va., on October 9.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends, with this session, we complete a seasonal cycle. In the year that has passed since our last meeting, world events have moved with stunning rapidity. We are just beginning to realize the severity of the sacrifices which the free peoples of the world will be called upon to make during the period ahead.

At this moment, of course, it is difficult to appraise the precise role which will be played by the organized medical profession. Of one thing we are certain, however: If the medical profession of the United States is to render effective service in peace or in war it must remain free. This is no time to bind the hands of the American doctor with the manacles of socialization.

Whatever the extent or the duration of the present crisis, we cannot afford to jeopardize the continued progress of American medical science. It is now high noon in the twentieth century. During the 50 years just passed the medical profession has made astounding advances in all phases of the healing arts. In the field of preventive medicine there has been an enormous dimunition in the diseases and deaths of early life, the acute infectious diseases, and maternal and infant mortality. The American community no longer fears an epidemic of typhoid or diphtheria, or smallpox.

In the field of medical research we have witnessed huge strides in the development of specifics. In the fight against bacteria the medical arsenal is being stocked with new and powerful antibiotics. One by one, the scourges of the human body are submitting to the unrelenting efforts of the medical scientist.

In the field of surgery, we have perfected techniques of almost incredible complexity. The clinical experience afforded by two world wars enabled the medical profession to perform near miracles in the healing of wounds and the restoration of diseased and damaged tissue.

The general practice of medicine is on a higher level than ever before. The family doctor has at his disposal diagnostic and therapeutic aids which increase his effectiveness manyfold. He has available modern and well-equipped hospital facilities, staffed by trained technicians. Opportunities for medical education were never greater, as our accredited schools turn out increasing numbers of graduates each year. In addition, there are expanding opportunities for doctors to undertake graduate work.

All these things are part of the case history of the past half century. I venture to suggest that in no other branch of human endeavor has there been comparable progress. And I venture to suggest, also, that the reason for that progress may be found in the fact that during these past 50 years there has been a strong spirit of freedom and individual initiative in the medical profession.

Progress in medicine, as in other fields, is best nurtured in a free soil.

What shall we say of the next 50 years? While we do not pretend to assay the future, we do know that we are far from the ultimate. We have only begun to be astounded by medical science.

That future, of course, is conditional. It is ours only if we continue to deserve it. It is ours only if we adhere to the principles of freedom which have guided our steps in the past. We shall lose that future if we permit the heady wine of socialism to dull our sensibilities and destroy our initiative.

I intend this as a solemn warning. The insidious processes of socialism are already threatening not only the medical profession, but all of our free institutions. This year 1950 finds our United States standing virtually alone as the last bastion of constitutional freedom in a world bent on embracing various forms of collectivist society. But our own anchors are no longer firm. We, too, are drifting, faster than most of us realize, toward the yawning vortex of the welfare state.

The great labor leader, Samuel Gompers, warned in an address given more than 30 years ago: "I bid you have a care in all these attempts to regulate the personal relations and the normal activities of the citizenship of our country before it be too late. For a mess of pottage, under the pretense of compulsory social insurance, let us not voluntarily surrender the fundamental principles of liberty and freedom."

We must understand that the body politic, like the human body, can be ruined by overmedication. In a class conducted by Sir William Osler, the students were asked how much of a certain drug should be given to a patient. One student promptly answered, "four grains," and none of the other dissented. Sir William continued discussing the case symptoms, and a few minutes later he was interrupted by the same student, who asked permission to change his answer. Sir William gravely consulted his watch and said, "I'm sorry, young man, but your patient has already been dead for 3 minutes."

We see much the same thing happening today in our Nation's economic life. Fuzzy-minded politicians and addle-brained theorists have the idea that because one grain of socialization has proved helpful, four grains will bring us utopia. Because it is necessary for the Government to undertake a few essential services, they feel that the Government should perform more and more services and ultimately attend to all our human wants and needs.

The advocates of government by overdosage are busy with their propaganda. They have introduced numerous schemes to set up a system of compulsory health insurance. They insist that America follow the lead of nations whose health standards are far below our own. We hear the assertion made that medical care is too expensive for the average American family. The prescription for this situation is to establish a vast bureaucratic monster to administer a compulsory health program at a cost estimated variously between ten and twenty billion dollars a year.

The whole thing is a patent nonsense. Why does America need socialized medicine when she leads the world in medical research and scientific development? Why does America need socialized medicine when we have more doctors, dentists, nurses, and hospitals per capita than any other country? Why does America need socialized medicine when American citizens enjoy a long and continually lengthening life span? Why does America need socialized medicine when there are enrolled today in voluntary medical insurance programs more than 70,000,000 people, in addition to the tens of thousands who participate in industrial, fraternal, and labor health programs and private group clinics?

Why indeed? The whole idea is a dismal distortion of logic. It is blandly declared that 325,000 persons die needlessly each year, and the implication is that if their medical care were only turned over to the Government, the figure would be mysteriously reduced to zero. But when we examine the figures, we find that some 40,000 of these deaths are deaths by accident—and no health insurance program I know of has ever been effective against accidental death. Another 100,000 of these deaths are caused by cancer and heart disease—diseases which are the inevitable accompaniment of old age. Communicable diseases account for 120,000 of the deaths. We know that these can be prevented, because we are preventing them in large measure. Through the efforts of the medical profession over the past 50 years illnesses and fatalities from these diseases have been reduced at an astounding rate.

The arguments advanced by the proponents of socialized medicine are so feeble that no informed person can be convinced by them. But there is one argument that the socializers have not yet mentioned. If they wanted to be fair about it, they would call as their No. 1 witness a man named Nikolai Lenin, the father of the police state. "Socialized medicine," said Comrade Lenin, "is the keystone of the arch of the socialistic state."

Here is the crux to the whole issue. Socialized medicine is the entering wedge. It is the decoy. It would be the means of creating a gigantic new army of bureaucrats, replete with regional administrators, inspectors, coordinators, and collectors. It would elevate political hacks to serve as local czars in every city, town, and village in the country. The healing art would degenerate into a political pill mill, with every doctor, dentist, nurse, and technician reduced to the status of a lackey on the public payroll.

The inevitable accompaniment of socialized medicine would be dictatorial control over the life of the individual. Members of the medical and dental professions, of course, would be the first to feel the long arm of Government control. They would be placed in the same position as the doctors and dentists in Great Britain, whose Labor Government has instituted an all-inclusive compulsory health-insurance program. Impartial observers agree that British doctors are so desperately overworked and so burdened with bureaucratic red tape that they are losing all incentive for adequate practice. "Quetopia" is the term that has been applied to the British medical phenomenon. The "something for nothing" philosophy has grasped the British people to such an extent that doctors are forced to waste valuable time dealing with patients whose ills are either imaginary or negligible, while truly deserving patients await their turn.

Yet there are those who would have us destroy the soul of American medicine by following the British example. There are those who would have us adopt an expensive, cumbersome, inefficient, and dictatorial scheme which would jeopardize the high medical standards of the present and the progress which we may expect in the future. There are those who would play fast and loose with the fiscal structure of the United States by instituting a tax levy of from 3 to 10 percent on every pay check up to $4,800 a year, at a time when our national economy demands rigid control over expenditures in order to fulfill our military and diplomatic obligations. There are those who would destroy the sacred personal relationship between doctor and patient and inject the Government as an unwelcome, prying third party.

You and I know who are the chief advocates of political medicine. They are the bureaucrats like Oscar Ewing, of the Federal Security Agency, who see in socialized medicine a means of expanding their power and insuring lush political plums for themselves and their political satellites. They are the powerful and arrogant labor leaders who view socialized medicine as an additional means of control over the vast army of American workers. They are the Communists and their dupes who view socialized medicine as the keystone of the arch of the socialistic state.

We may be thankful that the vast majority of the American people have not fallen prey to the fuzzy thinking of these elements. The front of opposition to socialized medicine is being rapidly expanded to include such influential organizations as the American Legion, the National Grange, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the American Bar Association, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Council of Christian Churches, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and numberless other groups and individuals who have the courage to stand up for fundamental Americanism and refuse to be lured by the siren song of socialization.

The stand taken by these organizations gives the lie to any assertion that the American Medical Association constitutes the sole opposition to socialized medicine. The American Medical Association is only one of many organizations which have banded together in this crusade to maintain freedom in American medical practice.

But let it not be assumed that the medical profession is content with a negative approach to the economic aspects of medical practice. The American Medical Association is a pioneer in the development of voluntary prepayment plans. The approach of the AMA to the Nation's medical problems is on the broadest possible scale, embracing mental and physical health, disease prevention, medical treatment as needed, prolongation of life, and research for the advancement of medical science. It includes also a program of nutrition, recreation, prenatal care, child welfare, construction of hospitals and diagnostic centers, and health education. Prepaid medical service plans already in operation under the sponsorship of organized medical societies have a membership of 70,000,000, and it is estimated that the number will be increased to 90,000,000, within the next 3 years.

This is ample evidence that America's problems of medical economics are well on the way toward being solved—solved not through any intervention of the politicians, but solved through the efforts and endeavors of the medical profession itself, with the cooperation of various lay organizations, acting under the time-tested principles of American free enterprise.

Ministers to the sick have a reputation which neither time nor calumny can tarnish. Even the caustic skeptic, Voltaire, could find it in his heart to write, "Nothing is more estimable than a physician who, having studied nature from his youth, knows the properties of the human body, the diseases which assail it, the remedies which will benefit, exercises his art with caution, and pays equal attention to the rich and the poor." In like manner, Robert Louis Stevenson wrote that the physician has an opportunity as no other class of men to be the flower of our civilization.

This is an opportunity we do not hold lightly. So long as the doctor remains free, so long as the society he serves enjoys a maximum of liberty, we have the promise that American standards of health will continue to be the highest in the history of the world.

War Goal of Reds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following very interesting and informative article written by James G. Colbert, of an interview he had with Col. Peter C. Borre, who is in a position to obtain valuable information of Communist intentions and activites here and abroad:

ASSERTS WAR GOAL OF REDS—HUB ATTORNEY REPORTS EUROPE SEES GLOBAL CONFLICT IN 1952—SAYS UNITED STATES GAINS PRESTIGE

(By James G. Colbert)

World war III will be touched off by the spring of 1952.

That is the considered opinion of a former noted Boston attorney and Army airman now practicing international law in Rome, who has been in a position to have his finger on the European pulse.

Attorney Peter C. Borre, home on legal business, declared in an exclusive interview last night that there is unmistakable evidence in Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Switzerland that Soviet Russia is getting ready for all-out war.

While stressing that anyone outside the iron curtain can only hazard a guess as to when the Soviets will plunge the world into war, Borre, veteran of two wars for the United States, in answer to questions, expressed the belief that the fateful move will come within a year and a half.

UNITED STATES GAINS PRESTIGE

He declared that American prestige in Europe has risen markedly as a result of the stand against Russian aggression in Korea, and said that the despair formerly existing on the other side of the Atlantic has been replaced by real hope for the future.

"I was in Frankfurt on June 26, the day of the outbreak of the Korean war, and the effect of the news on the German people was dramatic and electrifying," Borre related. "Not only was it applauded, but the Germans and others who fear the yoke of Moscow were convinced it would bring closer their day of deliverance."

DEPRESSED BY MARCH

He quoted one German diplomat, who had not been in the Nazi fold, as saying: "For the first time we can see the sun on the horizon."

Germany at that time, Borre pointed out, had been badly depressed by the Berlin march, up to then the latest move in the war of nerves, and the consensus of opinion among the German people was that the United States had dismissed the event too lightly.

Until President Truman decided to fight in South Korea, many solid German citizens, not in the leftist movement, had just about despaired of any real stand by the United States and the United Nations against incidents created by Stalin and were beginning to feel it might be the part of wisdom and discretion to deal with Russia rather than risk liquidation, Borre reported.

TENSE IN ITALY

The feeling in Italy, though not as acute as that in Germany, is still very tense because of the power of the Communist Party which still has much to say in Italian governmental affairs," Attorney Borre revealed.

"The fear held by Italians stems more from factors within the borders of their own country than from behind the iron curtain," Borre explained. "It is partly due to the fact that the peace treaty allows Italy only 200,000 soldiers, a hopelessly inadequate number to safeguard against internal incidents and at the same time offer any real border defense."

He said that the Italian troops could not even handle all the Communists in Italy, to say nothing of any attack from without. Strong and widespread opinion exists in Italy today that the nation should be given authority to expand her armed forces in order to be in a better position to combat any Communist aggression, the attorney revealed.

STAND BROUGHT RELIEF

Borre said that it probably is difficult for the people in this country to appreciate the tremendous impact our stand in Korea made upon the impressionable and jittery peoples of Europe.

"The Korean stand taken by President Truman was received with a feeling of extreme relief and is placed alongside his momentous declaration on March 12, 1947, when the so-called Truman doctrine was proclaimed," he asserted.

"Of course, the prestige of the United States suffered somewhat from the early defeats in Korea, but there also was a genuine expression of sympathy for the United States, and there was no question where the vast majority of Italians stood. They were definitely on the side of the United States.

"PAPERS ALLAYED FEARS

"The newspapers of the middle and right did much to allay the fears of ultimate defeat by pointing out repeatedly that America had been taken by surprise and was unprepared but that the same military might which annihilated the Nazi war machine would prove itself in the end.

"Recent events, particularly the establishment of the beachhead at Inchon and the capture of Seoul, not only have dramatized the potent power of the American juggernaut, but have convinced a nervous, uneasy western Europe that at long last the Russian bluff has been called.

"All this has resulted in an upswing in United States prestige and a drop in Soviet esteem," he added.

Some of the keenest minds in Europe believe, however, Borre disclosed, that, following the oriental philosophy, the Russians will provoke further incidents in an effort to avoid loss of face with her European and far-eastern satellites.

REDS LOSING IN ITALY

As an example of the change that has resulted in the thinking of the Italian people, Attorney Borre said he has had friends stop him on the streets of Rome and enthusiastically congratulate the American Government on its wonderful feat.

Communist influence in Italy has waned since the last election held April 18, 1948, Borre reported. He said that has been reflected both in a drop in the actual number of Communists and a lessening of the bravado with which they operate.

"No longer do they dare to try to intimidate the masses," he asserted. "The force of Communist power is felt today, however, in the labor movement dominated by Luigi DiVittorio, president of the Italian Confederation of Labor, who continually agitates and confuses the industrial picture by slowdown methods and work stoppages."

Borre interrupted his chain of thought with the observation that the Italian labor picture is not an easy one for Americans to understand.

FLOOD OF WAR ORDERS

"The Christian Democrats, who only 3 years ago broke away from the confederation due to leftist domination, are making headway by constantly recruiting new members and increasing their numbers. DiVittorio's organization, however, dominates the northern industrial cities of Milan and Turin and by no means can be written off as just a nuisance factor."

He said that the Korean situation has brought a flood of orders for Italian industry for heavy machinery, automobiles, textiles, and war equipment but that Italy also is faced with a shortage of necessary raw materials and a steadily mounting market price which might cause temporary disruption.

"Generally speaking, I find the average Italian workman, despite unceasing Communist agitation, to be the most willing worker in all of Europe," Attorney Borre remarked. "He works long hours, and he does much work of a heavy, laborious nature which is performed by machines in this country.

"HOLY YEAR PILGRIMS HELPED

"He is content with his lot if he manages to earn enough to provide food, clothing, and shelter for his family. The radio and the usual household appliances which are taken for granted in the home of the average American workingman are luxuries the Italian worker cannot afford, while the automobile is a superluxury owned only by persons in the higher income brackets."

Attorney Borre, who himself attracted international attention when he represented Dr. Peter Lindstrom in his divorce suit against Ingrid Bergman, believes that the American pilgrims who flocked into Rome on holy year visits have themselves been goodwill ambassadors who in their own way served to combat Soviet propaganda.

Borre's practice of international law has taken him into the capitals of Europe and has placed him in a position to observe closely the developments, effects, and undercurrent of the cold war, and his opinion that war is likely by the spring of 1952 undoubtedly will be given a great deal of weight in Washington.

GREATEST COMEBACK

Of all the countries in Europe, he said, Italy has made since the end of the war the greatest comeback from the standpoint of reconstruction of war damage. He said that roads and bridges have been rebuilt and that in the port of Naples, for example, the scars of war have been erased, the vast debris of sunken ships and ruined piers removed, and water-front hotels rebuilt.

American tourists who visited Rome this summer will be interested to know that Borre had some criticisms of Italian hotel operators whom he characterized as greedy, in the exorbitant prices they charge. Pointing out that Italy needs the dollars spent by American tourists, he asserted that there is real danger that the hotel keepers will kill the goose that lays the golden eggs unless there is a crackdown on them by the Italian Government.

Barbed-Wire Fence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post of October 7, 1950, entitled "Barbed-Wire Fence."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BARBED-WIRE FENCE

The barb-studded wires of the fence erected around the United States by the McCarran Act are now threatening to prick friend and foe, the dangerous and the innocuous, without discrimination. During the course of the debate on the measure, its proponents tended, ironically enough, to minimize its impact, while its opponents asserted that it would affect great numbers of aliens friendly, or at least not unfriendly, to the United States. Now that it has to be enforced, the State Department finds itself in desperate straits between the two interpretations. The language of the act affords little help. Indeed, it is language that challenges the intrepidity of lawyers and defies the understanding of laymen. Section 5 (c), for example, declares with characteristic lucidity that:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of the tenth proviso to section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended (39 Stat. 875; 8 U. S. C. 136), or any other law—(1) the provisions of section 1 (1) and 1 (3) shall be applicable to any alien within the purview of section 3 (1) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 153; 8 U. S. C. 201)," except Ambassadors, public Ministers, etc., ad nauseam.

Well, as accurately as we can figure it out, the act will bar virtually all of the nationals and some of the official representatives of a number of totalitarian countries with which the United States is now collaborating in resistance to the spread of communism. It seems clear, as we pointed out when the McCarran bill was originally introduced and as the President asserted in his veto message, that the definition of "totalitarianism" laid down in the measure includes such countries as Spain, Portugal, Argentina, and Saudi Arabia. Any students or businessmen or tourists from those countries, if they adhere to the regime in power in their homeland, must be excluded. So far as they are concerned, then, we shall be as much an iron-curtain country as the Soviet Union.

In addition, we think there will be serious diplomatic difficulties under the act. Its restrictions do not apply to "career diplomatic and consular officers who have been accredited by a foreign government recognized de jure by the United States and who are accepted by the President or the Secretary of State, and the members of the immediate families of such aliens." But many countries may wish to follow a practice commonly pursued by the United States and send over noncareer representatives for special purposes. None of these would be admissible under the terms of the act. If they are excluded, no doubt their homelands will counter by excluding comparable personnel from this country.

So far as the numerous United Nations organizations are concerned, the act permits admission only of "a designated principal resident representative" of a totalitarian government, "accredited resident members of the staff of such representative, and members of his immediate family." A totalitarian government might reasonably wish to send to the United Nations General Assembly a nonresident representative—Mr. Vishinsky, for example—and the United Nations could scarcely function here if such representatives were excluded by the United States. Moreover, to exclude, as the act appears to do, the families of all members of the staff of a totalitarian representative to the UN would be to impose on them a senseless and altogether unjustifiable hardship.

How the State Department will adjust its regulations under the law to the demands of its sponsors on the one hand and the demands of common sense and international comity on the other remains to be seen. The McCarran Act poses, we think, an impossible problem. Time was when Americans had enough pride in their country and enough faith in the durability of their own institutions to believe that a visit here would make friends and influence people in our behalf. Now we present ourselves to the world as frightened and ashamed. Like Russia, we have transformed ourselves into a hermit state.

Resolutions Passed by Thirty-second Annual Department of Nevada American Legion Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD resolutions numbered 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, and 10, passed by the Thirty-second Annual Department of Nevada American Legion Convention, dealing respectively with the capacity of the Reno Veterans' Hospital, the Hoover Commission reorganization plan to reorganize the Veterans' Administration, approval of the universal military training program, the control of prices, opposition to the shipment of strategic materials and supplies by the European nations to Soviet Russia or other Communist-dominated countries, and placing before candidates for office the resolutions of the convention.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 2

Reno facility

Whereas the Reno facility of the United States Veterans' Administration has a capacity of 168 beds, although only 125 active beds are available for use at the present time; and

Whereas the congestion caused by waiting lists and delayed cases is rapidly approaching an emergency, thereby compelling local veteran patients to seek hospitalization in private institutions; and

Whereas this emergency is not decreasing, but rather increasing and will continue to do so for many years to come: Be it

Resolved, That this situation be called to the attention of all members of the congressional delegation from Nevada, in Washington, to the end that steps may be taken to bring this situation to the notice of the central office of the United States Veterans' Administration in Washington so that arrangements may be made and funds provided to equip and operate the Reno facility to its fullest capacity; and be it further

Resolved, That the delegates to the Department of Nevada, American Legion Convention, assembled in Ely, Nev., August 10–12, 1950, in passing this resolution urge our department officers to work for the achievement of the ends herein set out.

Whereas the Hoover Commission reorganization plan suggests measures and legislation that are detrimental to the veteran, and if these recommendations are carried out, they will result in dismemberment of the Veterans' Administration into five separate agencies, with resultant loss of efficient service to the veteran, and with additional expense, confusion, and chaos to the Government; and

Whereas the national commander of the American Legion is calling on all legionnaires to do all possible to prevent this catastrophe to the veterans of America, if the recommendations of that portion of the Hoover Commission report referring to veterans are carried out; and

Whereas other veteran organizations, the DAV, AMVETS, and the VFW have joined with the American Legion in presenting a united front against dismemberment of the Veterans' Administration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the delegates to the Thirty-second Annual Convention of the Department of Nevada of the American Legion, That such convention assembled go on record as being unalterably opposed to any legislation or executive acts that will dismember the Veterans' Administration, and we demand of our Representative and Senators in Congress that they will do all in their power to oppose any move that will accomplish this purpose; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Nevada Senators and Representative in Congress, asking them to do all in their power to preserve the Veterans' Administration in its present form, as a one-stop service for efficient and economical service to the veterans of America.

Whereas the American Legion, Department of Nevada, has heretofore passed a resolution urging the passage of legislation effecting the American Legion universal military training program; and

Whereas the need for such legislation is now, in the light of present world conditions, more critical than ever before: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the delegates to the American Legion, Department of Nevada Convention, assembled at Ely, Nev., August 10–12, 1950, go on record as favoring immediate passage of universal military training legislation sponsored by the American Legion in accord with bill already presented Congress, and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to our Senators and Representative in Congress urging them to do all possible to have this universal military training legislation enacted immediately.

Resolution 8

Whereas prices of foods and commodities have risen at an alarming rate ever since the Communists started the Korean war; and

Whereas this profiteering has led to hysterical buying on the part of many of the Nation's consumers; and

Whereas wages and salaries have not advanced in keeping with this condition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the delegates to the Department of Nevada, American Legion, Convention, assembled at Ely, Nev., August 10–12, 1950, To petition our Congressman and Senators to enact immediate legislation and controls necessary to maintain a balanced economy during a minimum of regimentation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to our Representative and Senators in Congress and to the national convention of the American Legion to be held in Los Angeles, Calif., in October for adoption by that body.

Resolution 9

Whereas under United Nations Organization mandate, the United States has entered into armed conflict with North Korean Communist forces; and

Whereas such armed conflict will take the lives of American soldiers and demand sacrifice from and result in deprivation of American civilians; and

Whereas the North Korean Communist forces are inspired by and are under the direction of Soviet Russia; and

Whereas any aid or comfort, including the shipment of strategic materials or supplies, given to Soviet Russia or to other Communist-dominated countries is certainly inimical to the interest of all non-Communist nations who hold membership in the United Nations organization, and particularly to the internal security of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the delegates to the Department of Nevada, American Legion Convention, assembled at Ely, Nev., petition our United States congressional delegation to promote legislation which will effect the immediate cessation of financial or any other aid from the United States to Russia or Communist-dominated countries or to any other nation which directly or indirectly is engaging in the shipment of sales of strategic materials or supplies or is giving either financial or moral aid or comfort to Communist Russia or to any so-called iron-curtain countries. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Nevada congressional delegation and to the national convention of the American Legion.

Whereas the American Legion as an organization is interested in various matters of State and National legislation; and

Whereas certain resolutions have been approved by that body in favor of or in opposition to certain legislative matters; and

Whereas the American Legion has no effective means of promoting such legislation, nor has the organization taken steps to officially ascertain how candidates for State and national offices stand on the various issues: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That all matters of legislation in which the American Legion has expressed interest by way of resolution be taken before all candidates for State and National legislative offices and that each post of the American Legion be specifically advised thereafter of each of said candidates' attitude toward such legislative issues; and be it further

Resolved, That this said resolution be made available to all publicity mediums throughout the State.

The Communist Control Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the Denver Post on Sunday, September 24, 1950, entitled "Good Intentions But Bad Legislation," and also a column entitled "That's That" by columnist Bruce Gustin.

These editorials show the interest not only of a great newspaper, but of the people of Colorado in the legislation recently passed by Congress entitled "The Internal Security Act of 1950." As the days go by we find more and more that level-headed editors and those persons who generally love freedom are becoming aware of the danger of passing hysterical legislation. It is my observation that all types of the press of the country whether Republican, Democratic, or independent, are viewing with deep concern this type of legislation.

I trust that the action of those Members of Congress who opposed the legislation will be appreciated for its value in helping to preserve the time-honored principles of our Constitution.

[From the Denver (Colo.) Post of September 24, 1950]

GOOD INTENTIONS BUT BAD LEGISLATION

With the best intentions in the world, Congress has passed, over Mr. Truman's veto, a bill to control Communists which seems to be based in part on hysteria and in part on the mistaken belief that laws can control the minds of men.

Those of us who fear that the bill is unworkable and is more likely to help rather than hinder the world-wide Communist conspiracy only hope that its passage does not mean that we in America are about to begin to play the game of self-protection according to the pattern of the totalitarian states behind the iron curtain.

We hope the passage of the bill does not mean that we have lost any of our faith in democracy or the principle that, if our people are kept informed, they can be relied upon to make the right decisions.

It has been said that the new bill does not outlaw the Communist Party. Whether, in effect, it will do that remains to be seen. It does require the officers of Communists and Communist-front organizations to register with the Government and to reveal the sources of their funds. It requires Communist, but not Communist-front, organizations to list their members.

We are not hopeful that any honest lists of Communist members will be forthcoming. Evidence that Communists for several weeks now have been preparing to go underground to escape the registration provisions of the new law has been reported in the New York Times and elsewhere.

The names of some of the dupes and some of the less important Communist members may be registered, but not the names of the more dangerous Communist leaders. They will resign to form other organizations or use other ruses.

Has our experience with the Voorhis Act taught us nothing? It requires foreign-controlled political parties to register but the Communist Party has not so registered. It seems reasonable to believe that any real effort to enforce and check up on the registration provisions of the new law would require a vast enlargement of the FBI. But the law carries many other provisions.

It makes it a crime for a member of a Communist or Communist-front organization to hold a nonelective Government job although, admittedly, many unsuspecting people, including even some conservative Members of Congress, have been lured into front organizations.

No Communist can hold a job in a defense plant but it also would be a crime for a member of a Communist-front to apply for such a job without disclosing his membership. The far-reaching act contains many other provisions, some highly desirable.

The part of the law relating to the protection of "classified" Government information seems good, but it has been pointed out that under the evidence that was available in the Alger Hiss case a conviction probably could not have been obtained under the new statute although a conviction was possible under a safeguard we already have, the perjury law.

Our Communist-control laws have needed strengthening to give protection against espionage and sabotage, but the law passed by Congress seems to have gone far afield in some respects. We believe that substitute measures supported by Congressman JOHN CARROLL (Democrat), of Denver, and others would have been more practical and effective and less fraught with potential dangers.

[From the Denver (Colo.) Post of September 27, 1950]

THAT'S THAT

(Says Bruce Gustin)

Congress went the limit to control communism in this country when it passed the Mundt - Nixon - Ferguson -McCarran-Kilgore bill. It may have gone beyond the limit. There is grave doubt of the constitutionality, effectiveness, and wisdom of some of the measure's most drastic provisions. But with congressional elections in the offing, it is a reasonable assumption that the 312-to-20 vote in the House and the 51-to-7 vote in the Senate fairly represented public sentiment. Members of Congress have an ear to the ground, especially in a campaign year. Most Americans are more interested in stamping out the Red menace than in how this is done.

Two of the 20 votes against the Communist control bill in the House were cast by Congressmen CARROLL and ASPINALL, both Democrats, and both from Colorado. Theirs were the only Colorado votes against the bill. That took a lot of courage. ASPINALL is seeking reelection and CARROLL is running against Senator MILLIKIN, Republican.

In fairness to CARROLL and ASPINALL their votes against the Communist control bill cannot be taken to mean that they are opposed to reasonable, constitutional control of the Red menace. CARROLL introduced a bill calling for arrest and internment of all known Communists in the event of war. He opposed the measure passed as "useless, inadequate, and unconstitutional legislation which gives evidence of fear and indecision, and not courage and confidence.

One of the main and most controversial provisions of the Communist control bill requires registration of all members of Communist and Communist-front organizations. Congress would have been in a far better position to act intelligently on this proposal if it had waited for the United States Supreme Court decision in the case of the 11 Communist leaders who were convicted under the Smith Act. This decision should clear up a lot of questions about how far Congress can go in legislating against communism.

Proposed Federal Employees' Loyalty Act of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of Senate bill 3213, which may be cited as the Federal Employees' Act of 1950. This bill was introduced on March 8, 1950, by the junior Senator from Nevada and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it is now pending.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3213

A bill to provide for removal from, and the prevention of appointment to, offices or positions in the executive branch of the Government of persons who are found to be security risks or disloyal to the United States

Whereas each employee of the Government of the United States is endowed with a measure of trusteeship over the democratic processes which are the spirit and strength of the United States; and

Whereas it is of vital importance that persons employed in the Federal service be of complete and unswerving loyalty to the United States; and

Whereas, although the loyalty of by far the overwhelming majority of all Government employees is beyond question, the presence within the Government service of any disloyal and subversive person constitutes a threat to our security and democratic processes; and

Whereas maximum protection must be afforded the United States against infiltration of disloyal persons or security risks into the ranks of its employees, and equal protection from unfounded accusations of disloyalty must be afforded the loyal employees of the Government: Therefore

(2) Whenever any derogatory information is developed with respect to the conduct or qualification of an employee, other than with respect to his loyalty, from any of the sources set forth in subsection (c), the Commission may take such action as may be necessary to cause the removal of such employee from his office or position. In the event such action is taken, the Bureau shall not conduct an investigation under paragraph (1) with respect to such employee.

(e) If no derogatory information is developed with respect to the loyalty to the United States of an employee or applicant from any of the sources set forth in subsection (c), the Commission shall terminate its investigation and immediately notify the head of the appropriate department or agency that such investigation has disclosed no evidence that reasonable grounds exist for the belief that such employee or applicant is disloyal to the United States.

(f) Upon the completion of each full field-loyalty investigation, the Bureau shall transmit immediately to the Board a full report of the investigation which shall contain all evidence pertaining to the question of the loyalty to the United States of the employee or applicant.

REVIEW OF REPORTS OF INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) The Board shall distribute each report of investigation transmitted to it by the Bureau in accordance with section 4 (f) to a subordinate board. As soon as practicable, the subordinate board shall review such report and make a preliminary finding upon the evidence furnished by the Bureau with respect to the loyalty to the United States of the employee or applicant under investigation, and transmit such finding to the Board. If such preliminary finding is not adverse to the employee or applicant and is the unanimous decision of the subordinate board, such finding when approved by the Board shall become the final decision of the Board, and the Board shall immediately advise the head of the appropriate department or agency that, in the judgment of the Board, there are no reasonable grounds for the belief that such employee or applicant is disloyal to the United States. If such preliminary finding is not adverse to the employee or applicant, but is not the unanimous finding of the subordinate board, the Board shall conduct such a review of such preliminary finding as it may deem necessary. If after such review the Board agrees with the preliminary finding of the majority of the subordinate board, such finding shall become the final decision of the Board, and the Board shall immediately advise the head of the appropriate department or agency that, in the judgment of the Board, there are no reasonable grounds for the belief that such employee or applicant is disloyal to the United States. If such preliminary finding is adverse, or if the Board agrees with the adverse preliminary finding of the minority member of the subordinate board, the Board shall notify the employee or applicant under investigation in writing of the preliminary finding of the subordinate board, or of the preliminary finding of the Board, as the case may be, together with a factual statement upon which such finding is based, not disclosing, except when in the discretion of the Board, the interest of justice so requires, the source or sources of the information, and advising such employee or applicant that such preliminary finding must be appealed to the Board within 15 days after the date of such notification or it shall become the final decision of the Board: Provided, That the preliminary findings of the Board and factual statements furnished the employee or applicant provided for under this section, shall be held as confidential by the Board.

(b) (1) If such adverse preliminary finding is appealed as provided for in subsection (a), the Board shall consider such pertinent evidence as may be submitted to it by the appellant in writing or at a hearing before the Board. Following the appeal, after consideration of all the evidence, the Board shall make a final decision, and, if such decision is not adverse to the employee or applicant under investigation, the Board shall notify such employee or applicant and the head of the appropriate department or agency.

(2) If such adverse preliminary finding is not appealed, or if such final decision under paragraph (1) is adverse, the Board shall notify in writing such employee or applicant of its final adverse decision and shall certify to the head of the appropriate department or agency, that, in the judgment of the Board, it is established by the preponderance of the evidence that such employee or applicant is disloyal to the United States. Such certification shall constitute authority for the discharge of such employee or the rejection of such applicant, as the case may be, and shall be accompanied by the request from the Board that for the reasons set forth in the certification, (A) the services of such employee shall be terminated immediately upon receipt of such certification, or (B) such applicant shall not be employed. Such department or agency shall comply with the instructions in said certificate. As used in the preceding sentence, the term "employee" includes an applicant who is appointed to an office or position after certification, pursuant to this subsection, with respect to his disloyalty.

(c) All findings and decisions of the subordinate boards and of the Board shall be based upon the standard set forth in section 8 (a).

RULES AND REGULATIONS OF THE BOARD

SEC. 6. The Board is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. Such rules and regulations, and any amendments thereto, shall be published promptly in the Federal Register, and, among other things, shall provide that all statements presented to the Board by an appellant shall be under oath, and that an appellant shall have the right to be represented by legal counsel, to produce evidence and witnesses, and to furnish affidavits or other written statements of competent persons. Such rules and regulations shall provide that no finding or decision of the Board shall be made except after the concurrence of at least three members of the Board, and that the Board shall maintain a permanent record showing how each member voted upon each finding and decision.

ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES AND PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE

SEC. 7. (a) For the purposes of this act, the Board may require by subpena the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Any member may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Board. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the Chairman of the Board or any member designated by him, and may be served by any individual designated by such Chairman or member.

(b) Such attendance of witnesses at any designated place of hearing, and the production of books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents at any designated place of hearing, may be required from any place in the United States. Witnesses summoned under this section shall be paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the district courts of the United States.

(c) In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Board may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the investigation or proceeding is being conducted, or where such person resides or carries on business. Such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Board, there to give or produce testimony or books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, or documents, bearing upon the matter under investigation or in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district whereof such person is an inhabitant or wherever such person may be found.

(d) Any person who without just cause fails or refuses to attend and testify or to answer any inquiry or to produce books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, or documents, in obedience to a subpena of the Board, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

STANDARD TO BE USED BY BOARD

SEC. 8. (a) The standard which the Board shall use as the basis for the removal from employment or for the refusal of employment in the executive branch of the Government on grounds relating to loyalty shall be that, in the judgment of the Board, it is established by the evidence that there is a reasonable doubt the employee or applicant investigated is disloyal to the United States.

(b) Activities and associations of an employee or applicant which may be considered by the Board in connection with the determination of disloyalty may include one or more of the following:

(1) Sabotage, espionage, or attempts or preparations therefor, or knowingly associating with spies or saboteurs.

(2) Treason or sedition or advocacy thereof.

(3) Advocacy of revolution by force or violence to alter the constitutional form of government of the United States.

(4) Intentional, unauthorized disclosure to any person, under circumstances which may indicate disloyalty to the United States, of documents or information of a confidential or nonpublic character obtained by the employee making the disclosure as a result of his employment in or under the executive branch of the Government.

(5) Performing or attempting to perform his duties as an employee, or otherwise acting, so as to serve the interests of another government in preference to the interests of the United States.

(6) Membership in, affiliation with, or sympathetic association with, any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group, or combination of persons, known to the Board or designated by the Attorney General as totalitarian, Fascist, Communist, or subversive, or as having adopted a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny other persons their rights under the Constitution of the United States, or as seeking to alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means.

(c) The Attorney General shall, after full investigation, from time to time have published in the Federal Register a list of the organizations, associations, movements, groups, and combinations of persons designated by him pursuant to paragraph (6) of subsection (b). At the request of the Board, the Attorney General shall submit to the Board the reasons for the inclusion upon any such list of the name of any such organization, association, movement, group, or combination of persons, and, upon request, shall promptly advise the Board as to organizations, associations, movements, groups, or combination of persons not designated by him pursuant to paragraph (6) of subsection (b).

REPORTS OF THE BOARD

SEC. 9. Before January 15 of each calendar year commencing after the date of enactment of this act, the Board shall submit to the Congress and the President a report outlining its work during the preceding year, together with any recommendations it may deem advisable with respect to its activities. Such report shall contain a statement with respect to the status or disposition of the cases of those disloyal employees with respect to whom the Board notified the President under section 5 (b).

PRECEDENCE OF INVESTIGATIONS OF, AND ACTIONS WITH RESPECT TO, EMPLOYEES

SEC. 10. In carrying out the provisions of this act, investigations by the Commission and the Bureau, and actions by the subordinate boards and the Board, with respect to employees shall take precedence over investigations by the Commission and the Bureau, and actions by the subordinate boards and the Board, with respect to applicants.

FINGERPRINTS OF EMPLOYEES

SEC. 11. As soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this act, the head of each department or agency in the executive branch of the Government shall submit to the Bureau, through the Commission, the name and fingerprints of every employee of such department or agency whose name and fingerprints have not theretofore been submitted by such department or agency, and shall from time to time thereafter submit the names and fingerprints of new employees. Information secured by a search of the Bureau's name and fingerprint files shall be transmitted to the head of each department or agency through the Commission.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 12. There are authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Peace With Freedom

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech given by Mrs. Edith S. Sampson, alternate United States representative to the General Assembly, at the meeting of the India League celebrating Gandhi's birthday on October 1, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE WITH FREEDOM

I feel highly honored to be invited to speak on this occasion in celebration of the birthday of a great world citizen, Mahatma Gandhi. I shall never forget the morning in August 1949, when I stood with the representatives of some 25 American people's organizations to witness a simple ceremony, laying wreaths at Raj Ghat, the hallowed place on the right bank of the Jumna River where Mahatma Gandhi was cremated. Workmen paused in their labors in building the half-finished memorial. I'm sure in their minds as well as ours flashed vivid images of a man who carried on a long and successful struggle for peace and freedom.

That evening I sat in a corner of the garden of Pandit Nehru's residence. The guests were seated in a semicircle around the Prime Minister of India. Mr. Nehru talked of India's problems, as if we had been near neighbors who had dropped in for an evening's chat. And, as always in our meetings in India, the name of Gandhiji came to his lips. The Prime Minister and the workmen alike seemed to look at India and the world through the eyes of Gandhi.

On that occasion Mr. Nehru told us, with humility, that his Government was building and maintaining a military force for the defense and order of the new state. In this, he said, they were not living up to the personal faith of Gandhi in the power of the spirit, unarmed, and unafraid, to overcome evil with good.

Mr. Nehru did not try to make it appear that the grim necessity was the ideal. He recognized the gap between Gandhi's lofty principles and the Government's practice. Mr. Nehru told us very frankly that the "Gandhi way" called for many more millions with real soul-force than his Government could master. This was not an inadequacy in the the Gandhi way; it was an inadequacy in the community's capacity to walk that way.

Realistically Mr. Nehru recognized that a country in the present state of human development could not preserve its freedom without the means of material defense against aggression.

Perhaps mankind will someday reach that high state of maturity Ganhdi achieved and be able to resist domination by the might of the spirit alone. We shall never reach that day if too many men in cowardice exchange their freedom for a peace of capitulation, for the high character required by Gandhi's idea can never be the product of cowardice. It is the highest expression of courage and dignity.

There are three ways to deal with aggression—appeasement, armed resistance, and nonviolent resistance. We Negroes know from sad experience that the brutal will to dominate cannot be appeased by concessions to it. Those who prefer peace above freedom are bound to lose both. Peace with freedom requires a determined and united resistance against each threat of aggression. Gandhi never stood for appeasement. He was the terrible meek who led a movement of real resistance.

Negroes can understand the feelings Pandit Nehru expressed to our group that night in New Delhi because they have had a great deal of experience with all three ways of dealing with the power of evil. Some of us have tried to appease the forces seeking domination over us, and some have even collected their "30 pieces of silver" for their leadership in appeasement. Only a few of us have learned to rely upon soul force to resist evil, though many of us have had some experience with that method. But I think that practically all of us know that peace without freedom is slavery, and we have given a good account of ourselves in the fight for freedom.

Gandhi often expressed his convictions about self-government — about democracy and voluntary cooperation. He knew that the human spirit needs the chance to struggle for a better life by peaceful means, and that only democracy gives human beings that chance. To get a master off one's neck is only part of the victory over enslavement. The long road up to enlightened, cooperative living takes patient education and self-mastery.

We think of Mahatma Gandhi as the champion of victims of poverty and discrimination. He lived among the lowly people in utter simplicity. He saw their problems from their point of view. He thought of practical plans for improving their way of life—plans for converting wasted hours into the growing of food and making of cloth with their spinning wheels.

When the American Negroes' emancipation came only a few decades ago, we set forth on a new road with many rugged detours and stony side paths. First we had to fight ignorance and backwardness in ourselves. We had to learn to be free men, as a blind man suddenly given sight must learn to see and to understand what he sees.

During these decades we Negroes have learned how to fight for fuller freedom with many new weapons. These are not weapons to fight people, but to fight laws and customs and obstructions in the path of our human rights. We know how difficult it is to expand educational opportunities, and then to pry open vocational opportunities for the educated. We know how hard it is to get hold of the peaceful instruments of democracy, and then to use them with wisdom and skill and devotion for the common good. But we have learned to stand up and fight for our rights with these weapons of democracy—in the courts, at the ballot boxes, through free associations, in the professions and skilled occupations, in the cultural fields and sports.

This is not the occasion to recount the achievements of Negroes. I refer to our struggles here simply to explain why we have perhaps a special understanding of the ideals of Gandhi and the problems of Nehru. I refer to them to emphasize the point that nonviolence is a practical method of struggle in a democracy. And that struggle can be increasingly successful as people learn to use the tools of democracy.

We are acutely aware of the discrimination we must still resist and overcome; but we are also cognizant of the progress we have made. Our struggles have given us self-confidence and self-reliance.

We Negroes know something about the slave system. We know that it delivers a kind of security. We know that slaves never have to worry about unemployment, for example. The masters—and many of them were benevolent—look after the essentials of food, clothing, and shelter. And we also know the cruel marks of dictation, suppression, and the whip. We know what it is like to be forced to say that a lie is the truth. We know how it feels to be helpless in the face of arbitrary authority. It is a part of our folklore.

So we can tell the difference between a slave system and a democracy even though we do not yet share the full benefits of our own democracy. Armed defense of our democracy is to us the defense of the freedoms we have achieved and the rights we use as tools in the struggle for fuller freedom.

We will not exchange a measure of freedom for a precarious peace for ourselves; neither will we participate in the appeasement of an aggressor by failing to resist an encroachment upon the hard-won freedom of others. Thus, Negroes are not easily misled by false slogans to immobilize their spirit of resistance to tyrannies or to break their unity with other freedom-loving peoples around the world.

In Moscow there is an official humor magazine called Crokodil. Many of the cartoons that appear in Crokodil deal with the American Negro. In English, Crokodil is crocodile, which, as everyone knows, is a beast of prey and a symbol of hypocrisy.

The Communist press all over the world sheds crocodile tears for Negroes in its cartoons and stories. For example, in the New York Daily Worker, Korea is pictured as a war of color with such phrases as (and I quote): "Today under the orders of our southern President (meaning President Truman, who is the leader of the civil-rights program) United States planes are bombing and strafing colored people in Korea."

How do American Negroes react to such propaganda? Do the crocodile tears succeed in diverting attention from the crocodile character and his arsenal of teeth for expressing it? Let me read a few sentences from an editorial in this very month's issue of Ebony, one of the largest Negro picture publications. Incidentally, this is not an official organ of the Government or of any group. It is just part of the free, uncensored press of the United States. Here is what the Negro who edits Ebony thinks of the war-of-color Soviet line:

"The Communists are not the first in their attempt to use race and color as an effective propaganda device. During World War II, the Japanese tried the same technique. Their agents played upon Negro nationalism and through a call for solidarity of colored peoples had several fanatic so-called pro-African groups working in their behalf.

"But the vast majority of Negroes saw the war-of-color propaganda for what it was—a flimsy curtain behind which hid the ugly specter of jingoistic Japanese militarism intent upon world conquest along with Hitler. Intelligent Negroes recognized the war as a struggle between two ways of life—democracy and fascism—and they fought for democracy not only abroad but also at home."

With regard to the Korean conflict, the Ebony editorial continues: "By dragging the race angle into the Korean conflict, they are trying to disassociate Negroes from the feelings and attitudes of most Americans toward Communist aggression in Korea. By their war-of-color propaganda, they are crying wolf while making off with the lamb—in this case, Korea."

"There is no doubt that Negroes everywhere," says the editor, "are behind President Truman's move to block Russian aggression by force. Between democracy and communism, the choice for Negroes is clear and obvious. The Negro soldiers of the courageous Twenty-fourth Infantry Regiment who won the first American victory of the Korean War by taking Yechon, gave the most dramatic reply to Communist war-of-color propaganda."

It is interesting to note that Soviet propaganda nowhere in the world mentions the fact that American forces fighting under the United Nations flag with forces from other United Nations countries include many colored soldiers.

Those brave soldiers are proud to take their stand in the united resistance against what Nehru called naked aggression.

They are in the front line of a fight against a new imperialism. The freedom and independence of many countries are being defended at this one point.

Indeed, the future of peace is at stake. The historic record of expanding empires clearly shows that only through a united resistance have the empire builders ever been stopped in their march toward war.

God grant us the clarity of vision, the humility and the stubborn determination which characterized the life of Mahatma Gandhi as we unitedly seek peace with freedom.

Encourage Conservation and Development of Mineral Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of Senate bill 3570, a bill to encourage the conservation and development of the mineral resources of the United States, and for other purposes, which I introduced on May 10, 1950, and which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. This bill incorporates the provisions of Senate bill 2105 as it passed the Senate on October 6, 1949, and failed of passage in the House on March 16, 1950.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3570

A bill to encourage the conservation and development of the mineral resources of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Resources Conservation and Development Act."

SEC. 2. (a) It is the policy of the Congress that every effort be made to stimulate exploration for and conservation of strategic and critical metals and minerals and other essential metals and minerals by private enterprise to supply the industrial, military, and naval needs of the United States, and that every effort be made to encourage the development and maintenance of sources of these metals and minerals within the United States in order to decrease and prevent, wherever possible, a dangerous and costly dependence by the United States upon foreign nations for supplies of such materials. To this end it is the further policy of the Congress that every effort be made to maintain a sound and active mining industry within the United States; to expand exploration for those ores and other mineral substances which are essential to the common defense or the industrial needs of the United States; and to prevent the discontinuance of mine operations and make the resumption of mine operations possible until national industrial and defense requirements are met for the present and future security and safety of the United States.

(b) In carrying out these policies small mining enterprises shall be encouraged to apply for aid under this act, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Interior shall provide small mining enterprises with full information concerning this act, and shall make special provision for expeditious handling of applications from small mining enterprises.

SEC. 3. To carry out the policy of this act, the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter called the Secretary) shall from time to time, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of the Treasury or their deputies, determine—

(a) the amount of appropriated money to be allocated to the aid of exploration, on the one hand, and to the aid of conservation, on the other hand;

(b) the amount of appropriated money to be allocated to the aid of exploration for any metal or mineral or group of metals or minerals;

(c) the amount of appropriated money to be allocated to the aid of conservation of any metal or mineral or group of metals or minerals;

(d) the maximum price or the minimum price, or both, which may be paid for the purchase of any metal or mineral for conservation: Provided, That adequate allowance shall be made for depletion and depreciation in computing costs of operation or maintenance;

(e) the maximum amount or the minimum amount, or both, which may be paid on account of participation in the costs of maintenance for conservation with respect to any metal or mineral;

(f) the maximum amount or the minimum amount, or both, which may be paid to any producer or class of producers on account of exploration for any metal or mineral or group of metals or minerals, and the ratio which the Government's contribution for exploration shall bear to the contribution of any producer or class of producers for exploration;

(g) the particular metals or minerals or ores thereof and specifications therefor that shall be eligible for aid for conservation;

(h) the particular metals or minerals that shall be eligible for aid for exploration; and

(i) the time limits or dates within which contracts for aid for conservation shall terminate.

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, which must be complied with by applicants for contracts under the provisions of this act.

(b) The Secretary may delegate any of his functions under this act.

(c) All rules and regulations issued under the authority contained in this section shall be published in the Federal Register.

SEC. 5. (a) Any producer may file with the Secretary an application for financial aid in carrying out a specified project for exploration or financial aid to conserve a deposit of ores or minerals. An application to conserve may be either for aid by participating in the costs of maintaining the property in stand-by condition or by purchasing all or any part of the metals or minerals resulting from production from such deposit. The application and the project for aid disclosed by the application must conform to the express policy and provisions of this act and with the rules and regulations of the Secretary: Provided, however, That simple contracts covering exploration projects shall be awarded upon application to small mines and such contracts shall provide for the payment by the United States of one-half of the total reasonable costs of all tunnels, shafts, winzes, and raises in such a mine if it is determined upon examination that there is a reasonable promise of developing unknown or undeveloped sources of metals or minerals.

(b) The Secretary shall cause qualified mining engineers, geologists, and any other necessary technicians to make examination of and to report on each application, and to certify it to the Secretary either for acceptance, as presented or subject to specified modifications, or for rejection. In the case of a project for exploration, the examining experts shall certify whether the project offers reasonable promise of discovering unknown or undeveloped sources of metals or minerals. In the case of a project for aid to conserve a deposit of ores or minerals, either by participating in the costs of maintaining the property in stand-by condition or by purchasing all or any part of the metals or minerals resulting from production from such deposit, the examining experts, considering economic and practical factors, shall certify whether the project offers reasonable promise of maintaining in stand-by condition or in production, as the case may be, a property the production from which would, in the absence of financial aid by the United States, be discontinued or remain discontinued under such circumstances as to make it probable that for economic or technical reasons such production would not or could not be resumed when needed for the national economy or security.

(c) The Secretary shall either except and approve the application, subject to any modification therein which he may require, or he shall reject it. If the Secretary accepts the application, either in its original or modified form, the terms of the application and acceptance shall be merged in a formal, written contract. Any applicant who is dissatisfied with the decision of the Secretary upon his application may at any time within 30 days after receipt of notice of the decision, unless further time is granted by the Secretary, appeal to the Secretary for reconsideration of such application, and the Secretary, as expeditiously as possible, shall review the entire matter, reconsider his findings thereon, and notify the applicant of his decision.

(d) All metals or minerals purchased under the provisions of this section, or such equivalent quantities thereof as may be permitted by the contract with the producer, shall be delivered by the producer to and shall be received by the Administrator of General Services (hereinafter called the Administrator) at such places and times as may be provided in the contract. The Secretary shall transfer to the Administrator for the performance of his functions hereunder such funds as the Administrator, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, shall determine to be necessary, in addition to any funds appropriated to the General Services Administration, for the proper performance of said functions. The Administrator shall from time to time, and in any event before selling them in the open market, notify the Munitions Board of the inventory of metals or minerals held by him under the provisions of this act and shall continue to hold all metals or minerals received by him under this act until at least 60 days after he has given the Munitions Board notice that they are so held. The Munitions Board may, as long as any such metals or minerals are held by the Administrator, (1) direct the Administrator to transfer any of them to the national security stockpile in accordance with the provisions of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act, as amended (53 Stat. 811, 60 Stat. 596), or (2) within 60 days after such notice from the Administrator direct to him to hold any such metals or minerals listed in the notice until 60 days after the next succeeding appropriation for purchases for the stockpile has become available. Unless notified by the Munitions Board to either transfer any of such metals or minerals or to continue to hold them as provided in this subsection, the Administrator shall sell them in the open market if and when open-market prices will return to the Government at least the approximate average price paid by the Government for the metals or minerals, and only in such quantities as will not materially depress the market. No metal or mineral shall be transferred into the national security stockpile under the provisions of this act, unless the material has been found to be strategic and critical as provided in the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act, and meets established specifications as to quality and degree of refinement or processing, and unless such transfer is consistent with the current stockpiling procurement program of the Munition Board. All moneys received by the Administrator from such sales in the open market shall be for deposit in miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury, and any transfer of metals or minerals to the national security stockpile shall be covered by a transfer of funds from appropriations available for purchases for the stockpile to miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury in amounts approximating what the cost of the metals or minerals would have been if purchased in the open market at the time of transfer.

(e) All contracts entered into under the provisions of this section may be entered into without regard to sections 3648 and 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, or other provisions of law prescribing the manner of making contracts on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 6. As used in this act—

(a) "Exploration" means exploration in the United States for unknown or undeveloped sources of metals or minerals, including undeveloped extensions of known deposits, conducted from the surface or underground, by surface trenching, core or churn drilling, tunnels, raises, winzes, or shafts, including recognized and sound procedures for obtaining pertinent geological information, and including metallurgical research on processes for the production of such metals or minerals.

(b) "Production" means the production of ores or minerals from mines in the United States, or from tailings, dumps, slags, or residues of such mines, which the Secretary determines would, in the absence of financial aid by the United States, be discontinued or remain discontinued under such circumstances with respect to each particular mine as to make it probable that for economic or technical reasons such production would not or could not be resumed when needed for the national economy or security.

(c) "Small mines" means mines or deposits of ores primarily producing or which in the course of conducting an exploration project primarily produce (a) lead, zinc, or copper ores, or ores containing a combination of such metals, the average aggregate monthly production of which does not exceed 100 tons of lead, zinc, and copper metal combined, and (b) manganese, mica, chromite, mercury, and tungsten ores and ores of other minerals and metals the average monthly production of which, by quantity, does not exceed approximately the market value of 100 tons of lead computed and fixed as of the effective date of this act, the quantity limitation for each mineral and metal thereafter to remain unchanged.

(d) "Producer" means any person or persons or legal entity by whom or for whose account and interest exploration, maintenance, or production is to be or is being performed.

(e) "United States," when used in a geographical sense, means the United States and its Territories and possessions.

SEC. 7. This act shall not be construed as superseding or amending the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 755), as amended.

SEC. 8. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Department of the Interior not to exceed $60,000,000 in the fiscal year 1951, and thereafter, $90,000,000 annually for the carrying out of the provisions of this act, including payments to producers for exploration, maintenance, and production, and the costs of administration, such funds to remain available until expended.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be granted each year to the Department of the Interior such contractual authority in excess of authorized appropriations as may be necessary to assure the continuity of exploration and mining operations, all contractual obligations incurred thereby to be liquidated with appropriations authorized under paragraph (a) of this section.

(c) The provisions of paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section shall expire June 30, 1954, and no contract shall extend beyond such date.

SEC. 9. (a) Each producer shall at all times have access to a complete file of all copies of all calculations and analyses and determinations used as a basis for aid under this act, or modification or denial of his application, and shall be furnished a copy of each such analysis.

(b) The Secretary shall make annual reports to Congress on the operations under this act on April 15, 1951, and February 15 of each succeeding year. Such reports shall include current and summary information detailing the activities and results obtained and anticipated pursuant to this act, and such other pertinent information concerning the administration of this act as will enable the Congress to evaluate its administration and the need for amendments and related legislation.

(c) Advance payments may be made for exploration projects, in such amounts and on such terms as the Secretary deems appropriate, where the producer certifies the need for such advance payments as working capital. Advance payments received by operators shall not be commingled with other funds and shall be subject to post audit.

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the revolt against the alliance of the American Medical Association with the most reactionary forces in America, with its huckster campaign against medical and public health progress in America, grows daily. It is a revolt not only by the American public, but by decent and honest doctors themselves. In the last few weeks we have seen the deans of American medical schools protest the American Medical Association fight against aid to medical education. We have also seen the American Hospital Association say no to American Medical Association demands that no laymen participate in setting hospital standards. And now we have a protest from an eminent and respected physician, professor of clinical medicine at Harvard University and chief of the medical services at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

I include an article in the current Atlantic Monthly by Dr. James Howard Means, titled "The Doctors' Lobby," which outlines the problem of the honest doctor, how to get medical progress through a new and more enlightened leadership of the American Medical Association:

THE DOCTORS' LOBBY

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—American Medical Association medical care is for the people, not for the doctors, says James Howard Means, M. D., and skyrocketing costs can be reduced and better service provided by private enterprise only if the American Medical Association—organized medicine—takes a more open-minded and constructive view. Dr. Means is not a Socialist; for the past 27 years he has been professor of clinical medicine at Harvard University and chief of the medical services at the Massachusetts General Hospital.)

I

Medical science has made enormous strides. Are the American people getting the greatest possible benefit from them? Obviously not. The majority cannot afford medical care under the prevailing fee-for-service system, and in many places adequate personnel and facilities are not available. Because of these shortcomings, a rash of medical-care bills broke out in Congress. None of them was passed, and now, with a war on, they will be shelved indefinitely. If Government cannot help at this juncture, it is fair to ask whether initiative can be found elsewhere, and to what extent "organized medicine"—that is to say, the American Medical Association and its State and county societies—can improve the situation.

In December 1948, the legislative body of the American Medical Association—house of delegates is its name—voted to assess all members of the association the sum of $25 in order to raise a political war chest of $3,500,000 to fight socialized medicine. There was some fuzziness as to whether this assessment was to be obligatory or voluntary, although the word is hardly interpretable as "voluntary." There was, however, so much unfavorable comment, both in medical and nonmedical circles, on the expenditure of such a large sum by the doctors, apparently for the sole purpose of preserving the status quo in the matter of medical care, that the association could not quite bring itself to enforce payment. To do so it would have had to expel an embarrassingly large number of prominent members. During the, at times acrimonious, debate which ensued over the assessment, the editor of the association's journal, the voluble Dr. Morris Fishbein, came in for so much adverse criticism that in June 1949 the trustees of the American Medical Association decided to silence him, and subsequently he retired from the editorship.

This conservative attitude of the American Medical Association is of long standing. As far back as 1932 the well-remembered Committee on the Costs of Medical Care, headed by Ray Lyman Wilbur and made up of 50 persons—leading physicians, health officers, dentists, nurses, pharmacists, social scientists, and representatives of the public—rendered a majority report containing recommendations for voluntary prepayment plans which today look quite innocuous. They were not very different from that to which the American Medical Association is now at least giving lip service, but at that time Dr. Fishbein branded this report as incitement to revolution, and the proposed group practice as medical soviets. The American Medical Association does progress, but only in the wake of the steam roller of public opinion.

Directly after the elimination of Dr. Fishbein there was hope that at last the American Medical Association's leadership had felt the force of public opinion sufficiently to adopt a more enlightened policy. The American Medical Association had lost its voice in Dr. Fishbein; it had to find another. In March 1949 it hired the California firm of Whitaker & Baxter as public relations counsel.

This was not the American Medical Association's first experience with public relations counsel. In February 1946, in what appeared to be a forward-looking mood, it engaged the public-relations agency, Raymond Rich Associates, to study the association's public relations and make recommendations for their improvement. This was done, and several reforms were suggested. The house of delegates of the American Medical Association approved the recommendations, and in September 1946 Raymond Rich Associates were retained to carry them out. However, the trustees of the American Medical Association failed to give sufficient authority, and in June 1947 Raymond Rich Associates, which has been described as a firm of unquestioned standing and probity, resigned from the job, stating that their position had become professionally untenable. At a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the United States Senate in July 1947, Senator J. Howard McGrath said that the reasons Raymond Rich Associates resigned were, in effect, that the American Medical Association does not honestly represent the doctors of America, and in fact refuses to carry out their instructions. Thus passed a transient progressive mood on the part of the American Medical Association into its more usual one, of standpatism or reaction.

Whitaker & Baxter have proved to be more to the American Medical Association's liking. This outfit had previously worked for Governor Warren—in fact ran his campaign for governor in 1944. A year later they split with him over his proposal for health legislation, and instead they were retained by the California Medical Association to defeat the measure. After a bitter fight, the measure was killed in committee.

Whitaker & Baxter got off to a fast start, and in a year have built up a propaganda campaign of truly majestic proportions, euphemistically called education. So pleased with the results is the House of Delegates that at the annual convention held last June in San Francisco, Whitaker & Baxter's contract was renewed amidst acclamation. To support the education program, it was voted on December 8, 1949, to levy dues of $25 on all members. In contrast to the previous assessment, payments of dues is mandatory. Members must pay by January 1, 1951, or else they will be fired from the association. It can safely be predicted that a goodly number will refuse, and it will then be very interesting to see what happens. The association will either have to fire these members or lose face.

The line followed to date by the Whitaker & Baxter campaign is the same old Fishbein line, which has evolved approximately as follows: Down with compulsory health insurance—compulsory heath insurance is socialized medicine—socialized medicine is state socialism—state socialism is eternal damnation, and so on. Recently it has been claimed that the emphasis has shifted to the positive side. Instead of merely conducting a crusade against socialized medicine, a positive promotion of voluntary health insurance will be made. In the light of history, which shows that heretofore organized medicine has opposed nearly every such effort, one is entitled to wonder just how ingenuous this change in front is.

The doctors of the land have been deluged with campaign material portraying the horrors of government medicine. They are assured that the voluntary way is the American way—whatever that means. They are importuned to spread the official gospel throughout the community via their patients to the utmost of their ability. Every doctor is invited to make a political pressure outpost of his private office. The personal physicians of politicians are being urged to put the heat on these, their patients, to vote right on medical bills. This last seems no longer necessary, as the bills are dead ducks anyway. A Washington lobby to the same end, of increasing size and cost, is being built up.

The type of campaign material which Whitaker and Baxter are circulating in ever increasing volume is insulting to the intelligence both of the doctors and the people. For the campaign emblem a mediocre Victorian painting was chosen displaying an ill child, or maybe a dead one, a frustrated doctor, and a pair of despairing parents. Its selection well betokens the naïveté and obscurantism of the high command of organized medicine. Under the picture is the slogan "Keep politics out of this picture." Public places have been as thoroughly beplastered with this chestnut as with the advertisements of a popular toothpaste. It is on the same level. Its appeal is purely emotional. A proper legend for this picture would be: "Keep this picture out of medicine. It has nothing to offer. This child is entitled to be in a modern hospital receiving the most up-to-date treatment that medical art and science have to offer, under a prepayment plan its parents can afford."

In connection with the propaganda campaign a book entitled "The Road Ahead," by John T. Flynn, is being distributed widely to doctors and others. Doctors and laymen alike are urged to read it. This reactionary screed tries to show that everything which has happened during the last 60 years in Britain, and to some extent in the United States, is taking us toward socialism. The author's inherent sophistry is manifest when he claims there is no fundamental difference between British and Russian socialism. There is a stupendous difference. British socialism is democratic; in Russia, socialism is a form of absolutism. The essential of a healthy democracy is a strong two-party system. Britain has a very strong two-party system—stronger than ours. Any time the British people do not like their Socialist government they can vote it out. They nearly did so at the last general election. The American Medical Association, on the contrary, although it makes a great point of its democratic nature, does all it can to discourage any formation of a two-party system. What dissenters there are in its ranks, the association does its utmost to muzzle.

II

At the June meeting of the American Medical Association in San Francisco the speaker of the house of delegates, Dr. F. F. Borzell, of Philadelphia, delivered himself as follows: "We have seen, it is true, our warfare against the forces that would destroy us progress favorably in the last year." I suppose this refers to the fate of the medical bills before Congress. "We have won many minor skirmishes and some major battles, but the enemy is not yet annihilated. The evil spirit of Fabian socialism is still riding the stalking horse of communism. It is becoming more and more evident that we are the spearhead of attack that, if successful, will spring the gates wide open to the hordes of statism." The public may well inquire, "What's the shooting all about? Whose medicine is it, anyway?" The enemy which Dr. Borzell identifies with "Fabian socialism is presumably anyone who does not uphold the American Medical Association party line, even the most middle-of-the-road liberal. Certainly there is nothing in Dr. Borzell's bombast to indicate any departure from the old standpat philosophy.

On the same occasion the incoming president of the American Medical Association, Dr. Elmer L. Henderson, a surgeon of Louisville, Ky., spoke in similar vein. In his keynote speech he reiterated a warning not only against socialized medicine but against the entire socialization of the Nation, and claimed that only the doctors, mirabile dictu, can save the people from this misfortune. Physician, heal thy country.

Finally the president-elect, Dr. J. W. Cline, a surgeon of San Francisco, who will succeed Dr. Henderson a year hence, said a vociferous amen to Dr. Henderson's remarks. There will be no deviation from the party line under his leadership either. He enriches the official vocabulary with the terrifying term "coercive statism."

When it comes to coercion, it makes a lot of difference who is being coerced. One resolution passed by the house of delegates would outlaw the system, now in wide use and generally satisfactory, whereby hospitals often place certain of their doctors on salary and collect from patients for their services. This applies particularly to radiologists, anesthetists, and pathologists, and in certain of the teaching hospitals to full-time physicians and surgeons. Of course, American Medical Association law is not the law of the land, and is enforcible only insofar as the American Medical Association can bring pressure to bear through its own or affiliated organizations. "Organizational coercion" we might call it, to match Dr. Cline's "coercive statism."

The methods of coercion open to organized medicine include expulsion from membership, which would cut off, in considerable measure, the doctor's opportunity to keep in touch with his professional brethren—and without such contact the doctor rapidly stagnates intellectually. Also loss of hospital appointments might follow expulsion, which might make it difficult for the doctor to earn a living. It will be interesting to observe how much force will be exerted on the great teaching centers of the country to conform to such resolutions of the house of delegates.

One wonders what may be back of such a resolution. Chiefly, I think, it is organized medicine's inherent distrust and hatred of any element of lay control in matters pertaining to the provision of medical care. The doctor knows best—not only how to treat the patient, but also how the doctor shall be employed and what he shall be paid. No layman can tell him anything about it, or have any voice in the matter. That seems to be the attitude.

Next I should like to mention the opposition raised by the house of delegates to Government aid to medical schools. In the Atlantic for last June, Dr. George B. Darling of Yale outlined convincingly the financial plight in which our medical schools now find themselves. The medical schools are obviously necessary to the production of doctors; so are the teaching hospitals, but unless aid from Government or private sources is forthcoming, some of the schools may have to close, and that would be a national misfortune. Dean George P. Berry of Harvard Medical School has said that rather than let a school close, the Government would take it over and run it; but surely this would be far less desirable than keeping all the schools going under their own steam by timely aid. Yet organized medicine has persistently obstructed legislation which would permit Federal aid to needy schools. Actually, of course, many of our first-rate school are already operated and supported by State governments.

Thus it become clear that organized medicine has no use for any extension of Government participation in the provision of medical care to the American people. It also appears to be against the Government's coming to the aid of medical schools. If Government medicine is inherently bad, and if organized medicine provides no solution, where is the public to look for a solution? The answer is: To agencies other than the American Medical Association and its components.

III

Some promising beginnings have been made. In New York City, for example, under the sponsorship of the late Mayor LaGuardia and with his power behind it, a health insurance plan was started in 1947. In the first instance primarily for city employees, but not operated by government and open to anyone. It provides complete medical care, either at home or in hospital or doctor's office, all for a fixed annual premium of $34 for an individual, and increasing by approximately that amount for each member of a family until a ceiling is reached at $103.68, beyond which no further charge is made, however large the family covered. For persons with incomes of over $5,000 for individuals or $6,500 for families, these premiums are approximately 50 percent greater. Health Insurance Plan makes use of various previously existing first-class hospitals and has recruited its doctors from among the best. The plan does not cover hospital bills when hospitalization is necessary, only doctors' bills; but Health Insurance Plan requires its subscribers to join the Blue Cross and the two plans give complete medical and nearly complete hospital coverage. When it started, the county medical societies of the regions served were invited to send representatives to the medical control board of Health Insurance Plan. Some of them refused to do so, their chief objection being that there was a majority of laymen on the board of directors. Attempts were also made in certain instances to scare doctors away from joining the plan.

The Journal of the American Medical Association also disapproved of Health Insurance Plan editorially. Health Insurance Plan, despite the opposition of organized medicine, is a going and growing concern, and shows how private enterprise can solve the medical care problem when there is a will to do it.

A similar example is furnished by the Permanente Health Plan in California. Set up under the guiding genius of Dr. Sidney R. Garfield, this enterprise is an offspring of the health plans developed for the workers at Grand Coulee Dam before the war and the Kaiser shipbuilding plants during the war. For a premium of $36 for an individual, and $70 for a family of two or more children, and for a charge of $1 for office visits and $2 for home visits, it gives complete coverage for both medical and hospital care. That is to say, it serves the purposes of Health Insurance Plan in New York and Blue Cross combined. It owns its own hospitals, the major one being in Oakland. I have visited this hospital and talked with both doctors and patients therein. The doctors are evidently topnotch and the patients very much pleased with the plan. Nevertheless the county medical societies have resisted it in various ways. For a time they refused membership to Permanente doctors. The Alameda County society, Dr. Garfield tells me, has now admitted all his staff, but not the San Francisco society. Dr. Garfield has also been brought to trial before the disciplinary board of the societies on various charges of unethical behavior, of all but one of which he was acquitted. The one on which he was found guilty was of unduly promoting the health plan. For this he was reprimanded. Nevertheless the Permanente Health Plan is growing and meeting a very real need in the community.

Throughout the country there are other such plans in successful operation: The Group Health Association in Washington, the Ross-Loos Clinic in Los Angeles, the Labor Health Institute in St. Louis, and others. All voluntary prepayment plans of this type have been greeted by organized medicine with coercive tactics designed to force doctors not to associate with them. In 1943 the Supreme Court of the United States found the American Medical Association and the District of Columbia Medical Society guilty of illegally obstructing the Group Health Association in Washington.

The plans that organized medicine claims to support are of one specific type—namely, those which pay doctors on a fee-for-service basis and permit them to charge patients fees in addition to the amount paid by the insurance plan. In general these plans cover only fees for surgery and obstetrical deliveries in a hospital. A few also pay fees for nonsurgical physicians' services in a hospital, and a very few pay fees for home and office visits and diagnostic services outside a hospital.

While these plans are of some assistance in aiding surgeons and obstetricians to collect their fees, and while they act as a bit of a cushion for the patient facing a big bill for a surgical or obstetrical procedure, they obviously have glaring deficiencies. For one thing, they probably do not cover more than one-sixth of the average family's annual doctor's bill, so that they are hardly more than a token of economic aid.

Yet these inadequate voluntary insurance plans are the only ones which have received the support of organized medicine. If a nonmedical group like a cooperative tries to reach an agreement with doctors to look after its members; if an attempt is made by an insurance plan to set professional standards and to offer its subscribers only the services of physicians thoroughly qualified to perform them; if doctors are paid salaries, retainers, or annual per capita amounts instead of fees for every service, then organized medicine not only gives no encouragement but usually does its best to prevent such plans from being organized or from operating successfully.

In conclusion I submit that in recent years organized medicine has taken on a rapidly expanding political function. In my opinion, this is being exerted in a way which is not in the best interest of the people, for whom, after all, medical service is supplied. Medical care is for the people, not for the doctors. At the present time the provision and financing of medical care in many areas of the country are in an unsatisfactory state. The skyrocketing costs put a rapidly increasing number of people in the medically indigent class. Some way of prepaying for complete medical and hospital care and of lowering their costs through more efficient organization and professional teamwork is urgently needed. Being no Socialist, I should much prefer to have these things accomplished by private enterprise than by government, but I am certain that if private enterprise fails in this regard, we shall have Government medicine whether we like it or not.

In this emergency I consider that organized medicine has failed dismally. Its public relations are deteriorating. People look upon its motivation with increasing suspicion. It cries now for voluntary health plans, but does little actually to produce them. The record shows that when others have sought to do these things organized medicine has obstructed them. A learned profession has sunk, or been dragged, in its political sphere, to a distressingly low level. Individually the American doctor of medicine is, in most instances, an honest, sincere, and generous person. Certainly he is a hard-working one. When he organizes, however, his collective behavior is, at times, less noble than that which he displays when acting on his own initiative.

If organized medicine would drop its obstructionist tactics, and instead devote its energy and money to the creation of adequate health plans like Health Insurance Plan and Permanente, it would more effectively forestall Government medicine than it will with its present costly propaganda campaign and Washington lobby. What organized medicine needs in serving its political function is a new and more enlightened leadership.

Copper, a Symbol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD my statement before the United States Senate Finance Committee on Copper, a Symbol of Domestic Production and National Security, Tariff or Import Fee, Floor Under Wages and Investments, National Security, Employment, and Taxable Property.

There being no objection the statement was printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. GEORGE W. MALONE, OF NEVADA, ON COPPER, A SYMBOL OF DOMESTIC PRODUCTION AND NATIONAL SECURITY—TARIFF OR IMPORT FEE—FLOOR UNDER WAGES AND INVESTMENTS—NATIONAL SECURITY—EMPLOYMENT—TAXABLE PROPERTY, BEFORE UNITED STATES SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE, WASHINGTON, D. C., JULY 27, 1950

The CHAIRMAN. Senator MALONE, of Nevada, wishes to be heard on this bill. All right, Senator.

LONG-ESTABLISHED PRINCIPLE—NATIONAL SECURITY

Senator MALONE. Mr. Chairman, I have requested to appear before your Finance Committee on House Joint Resolution 502 providing for an extension of the free trade on copper for 1 year, because I believe the resolution to be in direct violation of the long-established principle of providing a floor under wages and investments through a tariff or import fee representing the differential in the wage standards of living between this country and the competitive nations. I believe that the passage of House Joint Resolution 502 threatens our national security as well as the employment and taxable property of our own country through discouraging the investment of venture capital.

COPPER A SYMBOL

Mr. Chairman, copper is merely a symbol in this debate, and just happens to be the first American product singled out for removal of all protection to the workers and investors of this particular industry. Thousands of other products have been severely shaken and endangered through the operations of the State Department acting under the authority of the 1934 Trade Agreements Act as extended, under which Congress transferred its constitutional responsibility to regulate foreign trade to the executive branch of the Government. The State Department was given the authority to lower tariffs and import fees up to approximately 75 percent after perfunctory hearings.

Further hearings are scheduled at Torquay, England, in September, with the avowed purpose of further lowering the tariffs and import fees on American products—venture capital is being frightened out of the investment field in these industries and bills are being introduced at this time to provide Government funds to replace the venture investment capital, which we formerly took for granted would be adequate for the growth of business.

The extension of the free-trade provision on copper is simply a trial run. Other industries and products that will be and have been affected in a similar situation include textiles, crockery, glassware, lumber and wood products, petroleum, precision instruments, watches, wool, hides, agricultural products, steel and steel fabricated products, mining products generally—such as tungsten, mercury, manganese, lead, zinc, aluminum, and, in fact, practically all American production except automobiles and the heavy machinery production which the foreign countries are not yet fully equipped to produce. Both tariffs and quotas apply to certain types of cotton.

All of these products are protected by a tariff or import fee, and in no case are needed imports kept out through such protection.

Senator JOHNSON. The extension or the suspension?

Senator MALONE. The extension of the suspension of the tariff on copper, which means the extension of the free-trade provision on that strategic metal.

Senator MARTIN. Senator, when did it expire? Was it July?

Senator MALONE. It expired midnight June 30.

Senator MARTIN. Of this year?

Senator MALONE. Yes.

FLOOR UNDER WAGES AND INVESTMENTS

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the war effort and what a great thing it is to have free trade during a war. I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the tariff or import fee principle representing the floor under wages and investments on American products is a national defense measure and applies especially to the strategic and critical minerals and materials produced in this country.

This is in direct conflict with any idea that such a tariff or import fee hinders the war effort.

On the contrary a tariff actually is a national security measure.

IMPORT FEE ESTABLISHES MARKET ON BASIS FAIR AND REASONABLE COMPETITION

Mr. Chairman, in normal times an import fee or a tariff as applied to American-produced products establishes a floor under wages and investments and encourages the continuance of venture capital into the business stream of the Nation, both during peace and war times.

In addition such an import fee, which should be flexible, assures the foreign nations a place in the American market on a basis of fair and reasonable competition.

That is all a tariff or import fee has ever been when fairly administered.

There is no question of a high or low tariff. The tariff or flexible import fee, representing the differential of cost of production between this Nation and competitive countries, assures the investor of venture capital in a business, that he will not be destroyed as soon as a supply of the product can be made available from the low-wage living standard countries.

TARIFF ASSURES INVESTORS AND WORKERS THEY WILL NOT BE DESTROYED

The tariff, then, properly administered, preferably on a flexible basis, assures a market in the United States for these foreign nations on a basis of fair and reasonable competition; and further, Mr. Chairman, it assures the domestic producer that he will not be destroyed while paying the standard American wages. It is not copper alone.

ASSURES FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC PRODUCERS EQUAL MARKET

Mr. Chairman, in peacetime the "fair and reasonable" competitive basis establishes a market for foreign production as well as for production in this country and assures an adequate domestic production for national security, employment, and for the development of taxable property.

"GOING CONCERN" MINING INDUSTRY—STOCKPILE NECESSARY

To secure maximum production of our strategic and critical minerals, such as copper, tungsten, mercury, lead, zinc, aluminum, molybdenum, and vanadium, without which we cannot live in peace or fight in war, it is necessary to have a healthy "going concern" mining industry. Our national security demands an adequate standby stockpile of such minerals and a "going concern" mining industry.

This condition can be attained only through the continuous protection of the labor and capital investments in the business, which can be done only by a tariff or import fee, preferably flexible and adjustable.

WARTIME—NATIONAL SECURITY PARAMOUNT

Instead of the three categories of safety for national security, employment, and the development of taxable property, which is what makes this country go in peacetime, in wartime we are concerned mainly with national security.

The haphazard lowering of the tariffs or import fees on such materials, and most especially abolishing such protection altogether at any time, is an open invitation to an enemy during a period of our Nation's emergency to concentrate on stopping imports entirely.

During World War II the chromite and manganese, for example, necessarily had to come from South Africa, Cuba, South America, and the Philippines. It was estimated at one time that from 75 to 90 percent of the ships leaving South Africa for the United States with such material were destroyed by German submarines. Now, with the snorkel submarine in the hands of the Russians, there is no question that the casualties of shipping from South Africa or South America would be near 100 percent.

IMPOSSIBLE DEPEND UPON IMPORTS IN WARTIME—UP TO 90 PERCENT SHIPPING LOST

Mr. Chairman, I had the opportunity of serving with the Senate Military Affairs Committee during World War II as a special consultant, and Senator EDWIN JOHNSON, of Colorado, served as chairman of the Subcommittee on Strategic and Critical Minerals and Materials. We wrote the report on Strategic and Critical Minerals, a copy of which I hold in my hand.

The scarcity of such minerals is coming again in this current emergency just as it did in those days of 1941 to 1945.

In connection with that special work I kept in very close touch with the WPB, the War Production Board, and had the secret information at all times that the shipping casualties were from 70 to 90 percent.

What saved us in those days, Mr. Chairman? The factor that saved us was that until World War II we had had a tariff and import fee on many of these strategic and critical minerals and materials; for example, on tungsten and mercury. I will not go into detail today, but I do expect to debate this vitally important subject fully on the Senate floor, if this committee permits it to get that far.

PRODUCTION—TUNGSTEN, MERCURY—WARTIME INCREASE

On tungsten, for example, the tariff was 50 cents a pound on the tungsten content of ore and concentrates.

That roughly made up the differential of cost in the wage-living standards and other factors between this Nation and the competitive countries, which included principally China and Burma. We know, of course, that China is gone, and Burma is in real danger.

It will be remembered that tungsten and mercury are among our scarcest minerals.

It will also be remembered that our domestic tungsten and mercury mine production became almost sufficient in production within 6 months after imports fell off through the shipping casualties in World War II, because before the war we were producing about 45 percent of the domestic consumption of these indispensable metals, Mr. Chairman.

Tungsten just happens to be something without which you can't make a pound of steel, just as copper is an indispensable war material.

When the State Department lowered the tariff on tungsten from 50 cents to 38 cents per pound of contained tungsten it closed every tungsten mine in the United States—just as the suspension of the copper tariff closed the independent copper mines. Of course, tariffs are not effective during a war because the price goes above the peacetime "fair and reasonable" competitive price, but the tariff is a definite floor under the wages and investments in the business, and investors are assured that their investment is safeguarded following the emergency—there is a floor under the price.

Production can be expanded during the emergency if we already have the trained men and the trained managers. That is the reason we were able to become almost self-sufficient in the production of tungsten and mercury within 6 months following the declaration of war in 1941. If we had not been in the business to that extent, God knows what would have happened in that war, and what will happen in this war if it becomes general is yet to be determined.

WORKERS SCATTER—DIFFICULT TO RESUME PRODUCTION

Mr. Chairman, as a result of the State Department's short-sighted, regulated policy the American tungsten miners are scattered. Many of them are not available, and many, no doubt, will be in this war before we wake up and find that we have to have them in the mines.

Mr. Chairman, the same thing is now happening to the employees of the independent copper mines of this Nation.

I remember early in World War II, and Senator JOHNSON will remember, when we were crying on each other's shoulders in the Senate Military Affairs Committee and in the subcommittee of which Senator JOHNSON was chairman, wondering how to get these miners back to work after we suddenly realized that we must expand the domestic tungsten production.

Finally we decided to recommend calling out of the Army 4,000 or 5,000 miners and letting them go back to their jobs, and as long as they kept their jobs they were deferred from Army service and if they quit their jobs, they were drafted back in the Army. And, Mr. Chairman, that is what happened—and it seems we are in a fair way to face that condition once more on account of again following a short-sighted policy. It is almost impossible to start a mining business in a short time. It requires many months to assemble crews and do the necessary exploration. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that in peacetime or in wartime the tariffs and import fees must be there as a floor under wages and investments to assure a feasible price below which the price of these minerals is unlikely to go. Then and only then venture capital will be available. I am talking now about minerals, such as copper, tungsten, and mercury, but it applies equally to the textiles, scientific instruments, and many other products. Prices will go above stabilized prices in wartime when you have a tariff and have kept a going-concern mining industry, and have the trained men available because then the wartime price will increase the normal production.

AMERICAN WORKERS VERSUS SWEATSHOP LABOR OF EUROPE, ASIA, AND AFRICA

The necessity is to get venture capital into the mining business in peacetime as well as in wartime and because they know immediately the war is over the price will drop below the feasible level in the absence of the stabilizing tariff or import fee. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of such a stabilizing import fee or tariff the labor in this country is placed in direct competition with the sweatshop labor of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It is simply a matter of paying American wages—the tariff represents the difference.

The situation now, due to the lowering of tariffs by the State Department, is that the tungsten and mercury mines in the United States have closed. The United States miners have scattered. The same is true as applied to the independent copper mines.

Senator BUTLER. May I interrupt the witness, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

COPPER A SYMBOL—OTHER AMERICAN PRODUCTS SAME CATEGORY

Senator BUTLER. You are speaking of tungsten and mercury. Is that covered by this resolution?

Senator MALONE. No; but I am simply citing an example. Copper is a symbol, as has been cited. Copper is only one of the strategic metals.

The pressure has been on copper for some unknown reason. The reason is perhaps not entirely unknown. The President of Chile has joined with the two large companies which control the Chile copper and the larger share of the production in this country, in doing a first-rate lobbying job in the United States Congress.

Senator MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, there are one or two things I am not quite clear on. What is the difference between the cost of production, we will say, of copper in the United States and in foreign countries?

DIFFERENCE IN WAGES, LIVING STANDARDS, AND PRODUCTION COST

Senator MALONE. I would say the difference in cost of production is in the neighborhood of 10 to 12 cents per pound. I could not furnish you the exact information because it is not made public by the operating companies.

Senator MARTIN. What is the difference in cost? Of what is that made?

Senator MALONE. Mostly labor; they pay around $2.40 wages in Chile and about $11.17 a day in the copper mines of America. That is the principal difference.

Senator MARTIN. Another thing, you said it took quite a little time to assemble the personnel to operate a mine. How long would it take to open up a new mine if you had the venture capital to do it with?

REQUIRES TIME TO REPAIR IDLE MINES—ASSEMBLE WORKERS

Senator MALONE. During the war it is almost impossible to open up a new mine because there is a prospecting job to be done first, and then an exploration job, and then the assembling of mining equipment and so on. It is a 4- or 5-year job even to find a good deposit of minerals.

The chances are against finding it during wartime. It is a continuous job of finding new metal, of prospecting and exploration and development that must go on continuously and which is made possible only by a tariff or an import fee forming a floor underinvestments to protect the venture capital and labor interested in the business.

You cannot build a mine like you build a warehouse—it must be a continuous operation.

VENTURE CAPITAL INDISPENSABLE

Senator MARTIN. A copper mine in order to be profitable, I presume, like a coal mine or the production of oil, has to have over a long period of years a relatively substantial market at a profit in order to keep the thing moving along, in order to encourage venture capital to come in.

Senator MALONE. That is entirely correct, Senator Martin. You were in exactly the same position in petroleum production prior to our getting into this war. If the war continues there will be such an increased demand for oil, that of course, again the existing producers will be in good shape, but little exploration will continue in peacetime because there is not a sufficient tariff or import fee on the oil at this time to equalize the cost of imports from the Middle East. Of course, without tariff protection the imports from the Middle East oil fields can close down production from our own oil fields that are furnishing fuel at a considerable distance from the point of production to produce steam power and for other uses. Such imports are coming in at this time. You remember, Senator CONNALLY complained at length about it on the floor, and tried to secure quotas set on imports.

Senator MARTIN. I would like to ask another question, although I don't wish to take too much of your time. Does a copper mine that is shut down deteriorate by reason of water or anything of that kind that almost destroys it? Is there any situation like that? I just do not know.

MICHIGAN MINES—FLOOD—WAGES LOWERED

Senator MALONE. Yes. For an example, there is a situation in Michigan that is described in a brief prepared and submitted by the Governor of Michigan, Mr. G. Mennen Williams, entitled "The Crisis in the Copper Country of Michigan." An excerpt from this brief says:

"During the early summer of 1939 the price of copper fell so low that the Calumet and Hecla Consolidated Copper Co., of Calumet, Mich., could no longer mine its conglomerate workings at a profit. The outlook for improved prices was bleak and the amygdaloid mines were producing at a slight profit, so the company pulled out the pumps in the conglomerate mines and the workings filled with water.

"The water had scarcely filled these mines when the coming of war made copper a critical metal. Our national safety demanded every ounce available. Engineers immediately began a survey of the cost of reopening the conglomerate at Calumet. Their conclusion was that in several years' time the workings could be pumped out and retimbered at a cost of about $20,000,000. Twenty million dollars was a lot of money and the war wouldn't wait several years. Millions of pounds of copper had to stay where it was, and the metal remained on the critical list throughout the war." That, Senator MARTIN, answers your question.

PETROLEUM—COPPER—OTHER AMERICAN PRODUCTS

Mr. Chairman, as long as the oil situation has been brought into the picture, I want to discuss it with a word or two. Petroleum is in exactly the same position as the mining industry and in particular the production of copper; in that the competitive situation in the Middle East is such that you cannot pay the high wages of ten to fifteen dollars a day in the oil fields in this country and compete with the cheap production abroad. The production was recently severely curtailed in the oil-producing States and I think is still curtailed at this time, Senator.

Of course, as I say, the war will bring on an increased demand and luckily it has not been curtailed long enough to stop the exploration there and to scatter the oil workers and destroy the investments. If we had gone on 10 years or 5 years we would be in the same position we are now with regard to tungsten and mercury and, as a matter of fact, copper from independent mines.

AMERICAN-CHILE-INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

The question, Mr. Chairman, has been raised that whether we are injuring Chile with the reimposition of the copper tax, it is said that this is a foreign-relations question, a foreign-policy job.

Mr. Chairman, the only possible reduction of imports from Chile through the application of the principle of the flexible import fee or any tariff or import fee such as the 2 cents tax would be by the amount of the increase in domestic production. The 2 cents per pound tax, by the way, is highly inadequate; even the 4 cents which we had in the beginning, probably would not even be adequate, but the State Department has split this tariff in two for no reason whatever, simply in an arbitrary deal made with another country.

EXCHANGE MANIPULATION—IMPORT QUOTAS, ETC.

Of course, we are entirely familiar—I hope the chairman is—with the import quotas and embargoes and manipulation of foreign currencies, with exchange rates and import licenses to keep us from trading with those countries. Chile as a nation practices manipulation of monetary exchanges—and utilizes embargoes, import licenses, and government taxes on imports. Nevertheless, this copper-tax reduction happened. The 2 cents tax on copper will help somewhat, although inadequately, to keep the American independent copper industry alive.

IMPORTS FROM CHILE ONLY AFFECTED BY INCREASED DOMESTIC PRODUCTION

So the only possible chance that any imports would be curtailed at all would be the increased production in this country due to the import fee or tariff. Tariffs or imports fees certainly do not curtail imports; they have nothing whatever to do with it, for only demand determines the amount of imports from Chile or any other source.

CLOSED INDEPENDENT COPPER MINES

When we extended this suspension of the copper tax last year I remember I walked across the floor to the chairman of your committee and said, "We will close the independent copper mines in the United States of America if we do this." The chairman was very reasonable about it. He said, "I would consent to 1 year if others would agree to it," and they did, luckily.

I said, "Well, we will be meeting again, and if what I predict does not happen, we can extend it."

But what I predicted did happen, Mr. Chairman. We closed all but a very few of the independent copper mines in the United States of America, and in those labor had to take a reduction in wages and investors wrote down their investments, and these few mines continued to operate on a smaller scale.

RUSSIAN SNORKEL SUBMARINE COULD DESTROY CHILE COPPER

Mr. Chairman, to the extent that this 2-cent tax would open these independent mines and cause prospecting and exploration and increased production in this country, certainly it would curtail imports from Chile. Mr. Chairman, this is a national security matter, and I want to say again, while I am on this matter of Chilean production, that I hope that the chairman and members of this committee will have looked at the map.

Those deposits are right on tidewater, near the ocean. One snorkel would destroy most of their installations in 48 hours, and we would be without copper. If the enemy did not actually destroy the mine installations, let me warn you that in the last war, as I have already said, shipping was destroyed to the extent of 70 to 90 percent when we tried to get these important minerals and materials from South Africa and from other sources. Mr. Chairman, any possible increase in domestic production would, as I mentioned before, reduce to that extent the imports from Chile, the normal peacetime imports. Now, however, with the war on, both imports and domestic production would be stepped up because of increased price and demand. So, as a matter of fact, in the event of war, we would import more copper than ever before, unless the foreign mines were destroyed.

PRICE LARGELY DETERMINING PRODUCTION

The whole point of mentioning national security is the analogy between the tungsten and the mercury industry during World War II. Those mining industries were not restricted to their normal capacity, like power plants, which cannot readily increase production. At a certain price, they can produce a certain amount of metal. With a raise in price, they can often double and treble their production in ordinary mines. During the war we increased copper production in domestic mines during one year up to 1,100,000 tons.

Senator BUTLER. If we put the price high enough, could we produce enough?

Senator MALONE. An adequate price affects production, naturally, and especially in the independent mines. But to fight a war we must have a "going concern" mining industry plus adequate stockpiles of strategic minerals, depending upon the extent of domestic production.

Senator BUTLER. If we put it up high enough, would we produce enough for your purpose?

TAMPERING WITH THE TARIFF DISCOURAGES VENTURE CAPITAL

Senator MALONE. We would not at this time, but we might if the tariff had not been tampered with. I want to say to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska that tampering with the tariff is almost as bad as removing it because the tampering shows the threat of possible removal. This Congress, in 1934, transferred its constitutional responsibility to regulate foreign trade by tariffs and import fees, and to regulate the national economy, to the Executive. This, of course, means that the State Department, the way this is set up, has that authority given by the two acts, the first one to make a 50 percent reduction, and the second 50 percent more, which adds up to a maximum of 75 percent. A 75 percent reduction in any tariff or import fee is the same as free trade, because there can be no competition at all with foreign imports unless there is a severe lowering of the standard of living here to meet the standard of living of the competitive country.

So I say to you, Mr. Chairman, with this power over tariffs in the hands of the Secretary of State and with his record showing he does not consider the differential of cost of production between the competitive countries and this country in fixing tariffs and import fees, you have effectively stopped the flow of venture capital into businesses affected by tariffs, such as the precision instrument, the lumber, mining, glassware, pottery, lumber and wood products business and many other American industries.

The people who are in those industries have to stay there. They have to do the best they can with their investments, but no new venture capital will be available, Mr. Chairman. If this tariff had not been tampered with, if the 4 cents per pound tariff had not been tampered with at all, if Congress had not shown a disposition to interfere with it, venture capital would be flowing into the copper mining business at a great rate. I have a telegram here from a producer in Battle Mountain, Nev.—that is, he was a producer—from the Copper Canyon Mining Co., Robert H. Raring, president, dated July 26. I will read the telegram at this point:

"Respectfully solicit your continued efforts before Senate Finance Committee for restoration of moderate tariff on copper imports. According to official Bureau of Mines statistics, Nevada copper production in May 1950 was only 63 percent of monthly average for year 1940. This downward trend will continue despite world situation until venture capital for new mines is protected against savage market raids of cheap-labor-produced foreign metals. Labor is biggest cost in mining and 2-cent tariff would help equalize position of domestic producers. Production costs of foreign metal well below domestic costs cause of wage differentials, and continued duty-free imports only swell coffers of foreign producers at expense of American workmen, and hamstring efforts to start up new domestic mines. Restoration of tariff need not increase consumer price. Production-cost differential between foreign and domestic metal sufficient to absorb moderate tariff despite any propaganda to contrary. Keystones of our national health are agriculture and mining. Agriculture was never better and mining was never worse. In the interest of self-preservation invoke spirit of Paul Revere to awaken Americans in these mournful times against soft-headed thinking and pink tea diplomacy. Let us look to our own ramparts and man them like Americans.

"Regards.

"COPPER MINING CO.,
"ROBERT H. RARING, President."

I also would like to insert then a wire from Mr. A. E. Petermann, vice president, Calumet & Hecla Consolidated Copper Co., Calumet, Mich. His comments on differences of cost of production are worth noting:

"Reurtel have asked Oliver Dom Pierre, Senator FERGUSON's secretary, to furnish you with a copy of a brief prepared for Finance Committee hearing. I have mailed copies to Senator GEORGE and all members of the committee, and, in addition, have asked Dom Pierre to file 15 copies with committee.

"Proportion of labor cost to total cost is probably higher in mining than in production of any other commodity. This is so because the raw-material cost is low, being essentially only depletion. Tremendously high standard of living in this country is inevitably due to high wages.

"Foreign producers of metals have same advantages as domestic producers in respect to improved methods, mining equipment, and so forth. In large part these are supplied them by American capital. Therefore, foreign producers, having cheap labor with low living standard, have lower cost than domestic producers.

"Where the basic cost difference is not compensated by high grade ore, or situation permitting cheap production, such as open pits, inevitable result is to place American producer in extremely poor position to compete with foreign producer.

"American producer cannot arrive at wage scale which will compete with African or Chilean. Therefore, except in times of extreme demand American producers must sell at level which means no profit. Since extreme demand is only occasional and temporary, incentive to find and develop new underground mines is lacking. Free trade attitude simply cuts all protection from domestic producer.

"Call your attention to facts that United States copper production has declined from over 1,000,000 tons per year to 840,000 tons per year since end of war. This largely due to unstable price condition and to free imports since April 1947.

"Have no information relative to zinc, lead, or other strategic metals, but am sure same situation exists.

"A. E. PETERMANN."

Mr. Chairman, the manipulation of the tariff, the fear that Congress will manipulate a tariff on the slightest occasion, discourages the very capital that Mr. Raring is talking about, the venture capital to prospect, to explore and to develop new mines. In this vein, I ask permission to enter into the record a table showing the change in the number of mines in operation. It is a sad, sad story, Mr. Chairman.

FIRST PROSPECTS—SMALL MINES—THEN CHANCE FOR BIG MINE

Mr. Chairman, in order to have big mines you first must have small mines. In order to have small mines you first must have prospecting and exploration. Someone has to find these prospects, and there has to be a chance to make money on the time and the money expended.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT DOES NOT PAY TARIFF—FABRICATED PRODUCTS TO GOVERNMENT NOT AFFECTED

Mr. Chairman, since this free-trade extension has been directly tied to the present war effort, I want to read the facts into the record: That the Government does not pay itself a tariff. If it did pay duties it would make little difference, because it would be putting it from one pocket into the other pocket. But during the war there was an Executive order in effect that no tariff would be paid on Government imports.

Mr. Chairman, it is also said that tariffs paid by private companies increase cost to the Federal Government.

Senator TAFT. Is that order in effect still?

Senator MALONE. That order is still in effect, although modified.

Senator TAFT. I never thought it was valid to begin with, but I know they enforced it. It never seemed to me that the statute on which it was based justified any such order.

Senator JOHNSON. Even if it were not effective and the money was collected over here and would be paid out over there, it is just a bookkeeping proposition.

Senator TAFT. That is why nobody has ever kicked particularly about it. That is not quite true, because, of course, the Government can buy some copper from other people in the products that it buys and on some of the copper it has paid a tariff.

Senator JOHNSON. Only the foreign purchases would be affected. On their domestic purchases the price would be increased.

Senator MALONE. I think it is clear, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, that there would be no money lost if the private producers—the sellers to the Government—paid the tariff, because the cost of the fabricated copper articles, for example, to the Government is only increased by the tariff on the copper content, and the Government would have collected the same amount when it was imported. I also agree with him that it is questionable whether the order upon which duty-free entry is based was legally sound. As the Senator has said, no one kicked about it because it made no difference anyway—it was a bookkeeping operation—from one pocket into another for the Government.

Senator TAFT. It is based on an ancient statute intended to give the United States Navy the power to import ships' supplies that they buy in foreign countries without paying a tariff on it. It was stretched to cover something that I am sure never was intended.

Senator MALONE. The point I want to make to the distinguished Senator from Ohio is that it makes no difference anyway. The Government would collect the duty and then pay the same amount to the processor in any case. If a private purchaser pays a tariff direct and then sells his goods to the Government, it still is no different. Let me put it this way:

Any articles imported for use in national defense and purchased by the Government are in fact duty free, despite any and all taxes or import fees that may have been paid on them.

For example, if a woolen manufacturer imports raw wool and pays duty on it, this duty is reflected in the price of the woolen uniforms to the Government. The part of the total price which is due to any duty, however, would be offset by the revenue received through the duty. Any tariff on Government-purchased articles would therefore merely represent a bookkeeping transaction, transferring a sum of money from Government expenditure to Government revenue.

In wartime, many war materials like tungsten and manganese, are allocated to arms manufacturers from stockpiles, imports for which were duty-free.

Any arguments, therefore, that tariffs and import fees are a hindrance to war production and national security are fallacious. So it makes no difference anyway, no matter who pays the duty. I want to make that entirely clear. I would very much like to have questions asked now if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. Chairman, the harm is done the industry since, by the very fact that Congress is continually nibbling at the protection of American workers from the low-wage living standard foreign nations, venture capital is effectively stopped.

PROVISION EXEMPTING FEDERAL GOVERNMENT FROM TARIFF PAYMENTS

Mr. Chairman, an appropriation act for the Navy Department approved June 30, 1914, contained the following provision. This is the provision that the Senator from Ohio referred to.

"The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to make emergency purchases of war material abroad: Provided, That when such purchases are made abroad, this material shall be admitted free of duty." (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 568.)

By Executive Order 9177, dated May 30, 1942, the President, under the authority of title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, approved December 18, 1941 (Public Law 354, 77th Cong.), extended to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the authority possessed by the Secretary of the Navy under the above-quoted provision of the act of June 30, 1914. Purchases by the United States Maritime Commission were included in the exemption by Executive Order 9495 of October 30, 1944, purchases by the Secretary of Commerce by Executive Order 9768 of August 9, 1946, and purchases by the United States Atomic Energy Commission by Executive Order 9529 dated February 21, 1947.

Mr. Chairman, it is abundantly clear that the tariff has nothing to do with the Government purchases for stockpile or for any purpose whatsoever.

Section 12 of Public Law 413, Eightieth Congress, Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947, granted the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Air Force the same authority with respect to the emergency purchases of war materials abroad as the Secretary of the Navy has in respect to such purchases under the above-mentioned act of June 30, 1914.

Mr. Chairman, further, by Executive Order 9903 of November 12, 1947, the President terminated the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to import materials free of duty under Executive Order 9177, and the United States Maritime Commission under Executive Order 9495, and of the Secretary of Commerce under Executive Order 9768. Accordingly, at present only the Secretary of the Treasury and the United States Atomic Energy Commission are authorized to import duty-free emergency purchases of war materials by virtue of Executive order, but the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force are granted such authority by law. The authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and the United States Atomic Energy Commission under the Executive order will expire 6 months after the termination of World War II and may be sooner terminated by congressional or Presidential action.

Mr. Chairman, section 502 (d) (6) of Public Law 152, Eighty-first Congress, Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, provides that any imported materials which the authorized procurement agency shall certify to the Commissioner of Customs to be strategic and critical materials procured under the Critical Materials Stockpiling Act (60 Stat. 596), may be entered free of duty. Under this authority, the Bureau of Federal Supply, General Services Administration, may import duty-free strategic and critical materials for stockpiling purposes.

Under the temporary exemptions from import duties, I go on to say, scrap iron, scrap steel, relaying and rerolling rails, and nonferrous metal scrap were exempt from duty by Public Law 497, Seventy-seventh Congress. Exemption was originally scheduled to run from March 14, 1942, until the termination of the unlimited national emergency, but by Public Law 384, Eightieth Congress, the exemption was made terminable at the close of June 30, 1949. Duties have been assessed on such scrap since July 1, 1949, except for copper scrap, the import tax on which remained under suspension under the copper tax legislation referred to below.

Lead: Public Law 725, Eightieth Congress, provided for the duty-free entry of lead during the period June 20, 1948, to the close of June 30, 1949. This exemption was not extended.

Copper: The import excise tax on copper, including copper scrap, was suspended by Public Law 42, Eightieth Congress, from April 30, 1947, to the close of March 31, 1949. The suspension was extended to the close of June 30, 1950, by Public Law 33, Eighty-first Congress. Since July 1, 1950, the copper tax (reduced from 4 cents per pound to 2 cents per pound in the general agreement on tariffs and trade) has been applied to imports of copper.

I want to make abundantly clear again that, even if the Government did pay the tariff, which they do not, as has been shown, it would be from one pocket into another. The Government simply pays it on the one hand and collects it on the other.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not go into further detail, but lead and zinc are in exactly the same category as copper. We produce approximately two-thirds to three-fourths of our domestic consumption of copper; in zinc and lead we produce more than half. I will furnish figures for the record. The imports make up the remainder.

COPPER—SAME PRINCIPLE AS LEAD AND ZINC

Senator MALONE. It is just as reasonable to suppose that we should take the tariff entirely off lead and zinc as well as copper. As a matter of fact, it has been severely reduced by the State Department, and the domestic companies have been severely injured thereby, as can be seen in the table which I submitted for the record. Lead and zinc are in exactly the same category. The only difference is, we do not have the president of a foreign nation here, as far as I know, lobbying to get the tariffs removed from lead and zinc completely.

MANUFACTURERS WANT "FREE TRADE" ON WHAT THEY BUY—TARIFF ON WHAT THEY SELL

Mr. Chairman, the fabricators of copper products, brass, etc., want to keep the suspension of copper tariffs because they are interested in availability of cheap raw-material supplies, they say. I suppose we are human like every one else; we want to buy anything we have to buy as cheaply as possible and want to sell everything at a profit. The fabricators of brass products which contain between 60- and 90-percent copper have a tariff at anywhere up to 60 percent ad valorem on all their products—and need it to stay in business. I do not hear the brass fabricator people asking for removal of the tariff on their brass-fabricated and manufactured products.

Mr. Chairman, they could not live 60 days without the protection unless a war was on so the Government took all their production at a higher price, because they cannot any more compete with the low wages of the foreign competitive nations in the production of these fabricated products than the copper men can compete with the foreign low-wage labor in the production of copper.

So, Mr. Chairman, in the case of brass products particularly, the rates of duty on manufactured and semimanufactured goods run from 15 percent to 65 percent ad valorem. Any one honestly interested in the welfare of the consumer of copper goods would have to be consistent and advocate also the cutting of tariffs on the brass semimanufactured and manufactured goods. I ask permission at this point to insert a table showing the tariffs on manufacturers of brass.

TIME TO AGREE ON PRINCIPLE—QUIT SHARPSHOOTING

Mr. Chairman, this type of argument has been going on for 75 years—luckily they are not often effective. However, such agreements lend weight to the State Department in its free trade—one economic world program; they play one producer against another, and eventually whip them both. It is a very shortsighted position for the brass fabricators to take.

Mr. Chairman, it is time for all American producers to agree on a principle of the floor under wages and investments based upon the fair and reasonable competition principle, using the flexible import fee method of adjustment of such tariffs.

COPPER TARIFF DOES NOT AFFECT COST TO GOVERNMENT OR FABRICATORS

Mr. Chairman, if the brass fabricators paid directly the 4- or 2- or 5-cent tariff, whatever it should be, and, of course, it should be adjusted according to the differential of cost between this country and the competitive nations, due mostly to the wage and standard of living, instead of just haphazardly lowering such tariffs and import fees with no thought or no rhyme or reason, the Government would get the 4 cents as they paid it. Then when they sold their products to the Government again the Government would pay it back to them and there would be no loss and no gain. It does not make any difference whether the private fabricators buy the copper from the foreign country direct or whether the Government buys it.

PAY AMERICAN WAGES

In the case I have shown, the Government buying directly pays no tariff. As the senior Senator from Ohio suggested, the tariff is a floor under wages and investments. So, as a matter of fact, even in peacetime, if the Government were buying the copper from domestic producers, the tariff simply prevents the price from going below the feasible mining cost. The Government would be paying the standard wages incorporated in the cost of the product. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, instead of trying to hold the price down so the workers have to lower their wages to keep producing. That is the only difference, and I think our Government should be the first to do just that.

COPPER A SYMBOL IN AMERICAN PRODUCTION

Copper is only a symbol in this whole problem of tariffs and import fees. There is not one iota of difference between copper, lead, zinc, and textiles, precision instruments, wood and wood products, petroleum, agricultural products, and scores of other goods produced by American workers. Agricultural products now have a subsidy, of course. If it were not for the subsidy, half of the farmers, maybe two-thirds of them, in the United States would be out of business, or very broke indeed.

FLEXIBLE TARIFF OR IMPORT FEE

I will say right here that if there was a flexible import fee applicable to agricultural products, 85 percent of the agricultural products of the United States of America would not need a subsidy, Mr. Chairman. That is easily demonstrable. I will not do that today, but I do intend to debate this whole subject at some length when and if it comes to the Senate floor. It is exactly the same principle as the petroleum from the State of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. It is the same as the products from every State in the Union. I will be prepared to show that on the Senate floor if this bill gets that far.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS NOT AFFECTED

Mr. Chairman, I want to say again that there is little chance of injuring diplomatic relations or international relations with any nation, including Chile. The only possible chance of a reduction in imports from Chile, Mr. Chairman, would be through the increased production in this country brought about by the attracted venture capital investment through the stabilized price—the floor under wages and investments—in exactly the same manner that the ad valorem tariff on brass fabricated products stabilizes the price in that field and we need such assurance especially because of national security.

The tariff is a stabilizer for the price; it would have little or no effect during a war because so much more copper will be used and so many more textiles, so much more of everything that practically everything anyone can produce can be sold at a profit.

PRODUCTION—PROSPECTS—SMALL MINES—LARGE MINES

Suppose it were peacetime and it did reduce the amount of copper shipped from Chile by the amount of our increased production coming from 50 or 100 new mines and prospects working in this country that might develop a few larger mines. It takes many of these prospects and small mines to have a chance to develop one large mine. The security of this Nation is the most important thing and not to be confused through a consideration of a few pounds of material more or less to be purchased from a foreign nation.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I want to say to you that the copper tax is a matter of national security. With these 50 to 75 or 100 or 150 new copper mines, a rise in price in an emergency such as this would increase production of copper a substantial amount and even more if the price went up further. This rise would take place if the submarines, the snorkels, destroyed access to those Chilean deposits, which could happen in 48 hours, and if they didn't destroy the mine installations, they could sink, as they did before, the vessels coming from South Africa and South America with the strategic, critical minerals and materials. We know we are in no position to stop the submarines at this point.

So, from a foreign-relations point of view, as I say, the tax will not reduce the imports from Chile now. It has nothing to do with international relations, but if it did reduce it by 50,000 tons or 75,000 tons in the peacetime future, isn't it worth it to have additional national security? The same is true in regard to petroleum and many other products. The Middle East oil was about to shut down many of our wells and would have done it had we had 3, 4, or 5 years more without a war. Is it not worth it to have this copper and petroleum available so that production can be immediately increased if necessary? The United States is all of the protection that Chile has—she should cooperate with us in more national security—not less. We produced up to 1,100,000 tons in 1 year in World War II.

I venture to say, if they destroyed the Chile mine installations and we had kept this tariff on copper at 4 cents a pound and all these mines had remained open, this Nation could be much more secure.

I just read into the record a telegram from Robert Raring, of Battle Mountain, Nev., I have dozens of such briefs and wires which I will read into the record on the Senate floor from many States throughout the Union.

I want to say again that until Congress quits its nibbling at the tariff structure of this country continually, venture capital will continue to back away from business investments. All that tariff ever was was a floor under wages and investments and it encouraged venture capital to go into business, because no matter where the price goes, no matter how great in times of temporary shortage, investors know there is a floor under that investment below which it is not likely to go.

VENTURE CAPITAL

You could not sell a share of independent copper stock in the United States of America today to anyone even if he had $10,000,000 unless he thinks the war is going to last long enough and he might get his investment back, but not in peacetime. The people who have their money in these mines, like Bob Raring, at Battle Mountain, and like the investors in the mine about which the Governor of Michigan writes—they have to do the best they can to get their money out of the mines' continued operation, but no new money will come in. Anybody who is not in the oil business would not enter it if we did not have a tariff on oil.

PETROLEUM IMPORT QUOTAS

The distinguished Senator from Texas tried to get a 5-percent quota on oil which, of course, would have helped, and I voted for it. It is not the right way to do it, but it would have helped the oil business. If you use quotas, if you use subsidies, you are simply manipulating your production and putting into the hands of a bureau the whole business structure of the United States of America.

SUBSIDIES VERSUS TARIFFS

I want to say to you before I close, Mr. Chairman, that the difference between subsidies and tariffs and import fees is a very important one. In a subsidy the Congress appropriates money from the taxpayers of the United States of America every year. There is a continual danger in, for instance, a subsidy to agriculture, because when the payments grow, the people get alarmed and then Congress may not appropriate the subsidy money, and then everybody is broke.

There is no convalescent period. But a tariff is not subject to any bureau; it is not subject to an appropriation every year. It is based on principle. The tariff, of course, should be adjustable, but a tariff that is not adjustable is better than no protection at all. So if you have a tariff it is a matter of principle by law. Therefore, if this principle is followed for several years and there is no interference with the tariff, no interference with the import fees, then venture capital will start back into business because investors know that a law must be changed to change the principle. Committee hearings must be held—it must pass both houses of Congress—and lastly the President must sign it.

Free traders know then that they have to go before a Senate committee, that they have to go on the floor of Congress, that they have to get the signature of the President to bring about a change. The continual manipulation and the continual nibbling at this protection of venture capital, the floor under wages and investments, has severely shaken the economic structure of this country.

I said before the distinguished Senator from Arizona entered the room, that copper is a symbol in this whole field. It is a vital subject and has to be reckoned with. Mr. Chairman, I submit for the record a table showing products affected by the tariff in certain States. And I will not read it all.

PRODUCTS AFFECTED BY THE TARIFF IN SELECTED STATES

It will be noted that each member of the committee has several products affected by the tariff, but on which reductions have been made or will be made, in his State.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to enter into the record just a partial list of the products that are in exactly the same category as copper, except that we do not have as yet an open lobby representing the President of a nation where these products are produced, demanding the removal of the tariff. We have what the State Department calls reciprocal trade treaties, made under the 1934 Trade Agreements Act. Of course, such trade treaties never were reciprocal, were never intended to be, and do not operate that way, as everyone can see now, for the very simple reason that when foreign nations agree to lower a tariff, they immediately establish quotas and embargoes, and manipulate their currency values, impose a permit system for imports, and defeat our objective from the outset.

CURRENCY MANIPULATION PERMITS, ETC.

I want to say to you just briefly that I do have much information on how foreign nations' currency is manipulated in most of the foreign countries for trade advantage. For example, in Colombia an importer wanted to buy a certain product made in the United States. They gave him the exchange, but what happened? They said he must pay 3½ pesos to the dollar used to purchase the goods in America.

The official exchange is 1.96 pesos to the dollar. So the competing countries, it happened to be that in that case England and Scotland were the chief competitors—so Colombia could give importers from other countries 2 pesos, 2½, or even 3—to the dollar—and the deal was off as far as the Americans were concerned.

That is one way currencies are manipulated through exchange controls. I have gone into some detail on the Senate floor about this manipulation. Of course, we are all familiar with the latest lowering of the pound last year, which had a tremendous effect on trade agreements that had been made before. Even if they were allowed to be carried out without the quotas and embargoes and manipulations day by day that they exercise, the lowering of the pound would simply nullify every trade agreement that had been made up to that time. It is a form of trade piracy, the effect of which is apparently little understood in this country.

WAGE AND INCOME MANIPULATED

Mr. Chairman, in closing I want to say that there is a well-understood deal in the agreements between the major copper companies and the Chilean Government. I want to give you some detail in regard to this because it is the crux of the wage-living standard of that country. The Chilean Government has four basic exchange rates in relation to the dollar. These are set up so as to provide the Government with maximum dollar balances, even though Chilean importers and exporters often receive far less than the full dollar value of the respective articles.

The official Government rate of 19.37 pesos to the dollar must be used by the large mining companies and to cover costs of operation of the mines in Chile. Each dollar earned only represents 19.37 pesos for them, while at the free rate each dollar is worth 90 pesos. The result is that the Chilean exchange authorities make a profit of 70 pesos on each dollar.

There have been intimations that the duty of 2 or 4 cents would affect the Chilean workers' wage rates and cause labor disturbances, even threats of communism.

It may not be generally known and understood in this country that the amount that the Chilean worker receives for his day's work has little or no relation to the price of copper but is dependent upon the peculiar system of using different exchange values for different purposes.

To show the relation to copper under the present system, if the sale price were 20 cents per pound, a Chilean exporting 5 pounds would receive approximately a dollar. Excluding transportation and marketing costs, the Chilean Government would then take this dollar and give the Chilean copper firm 19 pesos. The Government would thus have made 70 pesos on the transaction.

On the other hand, a Chilean wishing to import something from the United States, for example, a camera film costing $1, would have to take 43 pesos to the Chilean foreign exchange office in order to receive that needed dollar. If he were going to buy some less essential item or were to visit the United States, he would have to spend 90 pesos on the free market to get his dollar. And a Chilean miner only earns approximately 225 pesos a day, or between $2.40 and $3.75 depending on the rate of exchange.

Any reduction of copper exports to the United States could easily be compensated by the Chilean Government by according a more favorable exchange rate to Chilean copper exporters, since the worker does not benefit in any case. The total amount of dollars earned by the Chilean economy would have to be accordingly less.

The second rate of 25 pesos or the export draft rate is limited to use for imports of newsprint. The third rate of 31 pesos to the dollar is used for converting nitrate export proceeds, for most official transactions, and for certain basic imported commodities. The fourth rate of 43 pesos to the dollar is the banking rate or the one used in the exchange derived from industrial and agricultural exports.

In addition to these rates, the Chilean Government has begun the practice of licensing temporary individual export transactions at rates of anywhere from 50 to 100 pesos and connecting them with all imports at the same rate.

The free or curb exchange rate is 90 pesos to the dollar, which rose from 60 in 1948 to 100 pesos to the dollar at the end of 1949, and then fell again to 90 in 1950. The Chilean Government eventually plans to have a fixed rate of 60 to the dollar to cover all transactions, hoping that through devaluation the free rate will also find this level.

Mr. Chairman, further, I want to review briefly the arguments that have been used in this connection. I read the testimony that has been presented in the House hearings, and which has become a part of the Senate hearings, or I understand will become a part. Now I want to take up each of the arguments presented for the tax suspension and answer each one briefly.

First, the political and economic foreign relations, particularly with Chile, would suffer through the reimposition of the copper import tax. I referred to Chilean exchange manipulation just now and shall not explain it again. At present demand for copper, it is unlikely that imports would be reduced below the present level in any case. Any increase in domestic production of copper would not take place immediately, and it would be a moderate increase in any case. The imposition of the tax would, however, produce the effect that any slump in the market would not close down our mines before we reduce the imports from foreign sources, and the peacetime stabilization effect of the tariff on venture capital would be effective at once.

The second argument is that Chile is largely dependent upon copper exports for foreign exchange and revenue. It is more important to preserve the standard of living of our own miners and the national security here than to consider livelihood abroad. Besides, as was pointed out, imports will only be affected through the reimposition of the tax at present demand levels by the relatively small increase in the domestic production.

DOMESTIC PRODUCTION CONTROLLED

Mr. Chairman, third, it is said that the 2-cent copper import tax would immediately be reflected in the selling price of copper and brass products. In the past the differential in cost of foreign and domestic copper has rarely exceeded 1 cent, even when the copper import tax was 4 cents per pound.

In the beginning it is possible that price rises up to 2 cents may take place. However, after a short period of readjustment, it is likely that the domestic copper price will again approach the level of the world price for copper. As I have already said, in part it is a manipulated price, since it is a controlled price.

The production in this country is entirely controlled, since the closing of the independent copper mines, by three major companies, and two of those major companies entirely control the Chilean production, which is the competitive country at the present time. At this point I ask permission to insert a short memorandum on the control of brass fabricators by the major copper producers. It is an interesting document, Mr. Chairman.

"FABRICATORS

"WHAT CONSTITUTES THE FABRICATION INDUSTRY

"The fabricator is the principal customer of the primary copper producer. Here most of the copper is put into semifinished form of sheets, rods, wire, extruded or rolled shapes, etc., which constitute the raw materials for a vast industry of processors of articles for final consumption or of parts for the products of other industries. The stream fans out from about 20 primary copper establishments in the United States to more than 5,000 processors, not including the electrical and machinery manufacturers who use large quantities of copper and copper products.

"There are about 80 companies in the United States generally recognized as important fabricators and users of raw copper, the latter being, for the most part, the large electrical manufacturers such as General Electric, Westinghouse, etc. The more important of the fabricators are owned or controlled by one or the other of the great copper producers, giving them completely integrated operations from the mines to the finished brass and copper products. Thus, for example:

"American Smelting & Refining Co.[1] has interlocking directorate with General Cable Corp. (Kennecott Copper Corp. controls: Chase Brass & Copper Co., Inc., American Electrical Works, now Kennecott Wire & Cable Co. Anaconda Copper Mining Co. controls: American Brass Co., Anaconda Wire & Cable Co. Phelps-Dodge Corp. controls: National Electric Products Corp., Habirshaw Electric Cable Co. Seventy-five to eighty percent of fabricating industry.)

"Each of the fabricators listed above represents the merger or acquisition of various concerns well known in the past as important producers of copper and brass products. The only important fabricators not now controlled by the copper producers are: Bridgeport Brass Co., Scoville Manufacturing Co., Okonite Co. (wire and cable), Muller Brass Co.

"Revere Copper & Brass Co., Inc., has interlocking directorate with American Smelting & Refining Co.

"The brass fabricators controlled by the three major name copper producers produce approximately 75 to 80 percent of all of the brass-fabricated products in this country."

Senator MALONE. I ask permission to put in the RECORD the arguments that have been raised here and in the House to hearings and their refutations.

The CHAIRMAN. You may put those in the RECORD.

"DEMAND EXCEEDS DOMESTIC SUPPLY FOR SOME TIME TO COME

"At present levels of production, and in the light of the present war crisis, it is likely that the demand for copper will remain relatively high for some time to come. The 2-cents-per-pound tax is not designed to keep imports out nor is it designed to increase the price of copper to the domestic user. The tax will merely represent an inadequate floor under wages and a small measure of protection for the domestic copper-mining industry. The tax will fulfill its purpose mainly in the case of a severe drop in copper prices. In that case, the tax will serve as a small price cushion and will make up to a small degree the differential in cost of production between foreign and domestic copper.

"THE TAX WILL REDUCE THE COMPETITIVE POSITION OF COPPER BY USING SUBSTITUTES TO A GREATER DEGREE

"This argument runs counter to the argument that the tax will increase copper prices. To the extent that the copper price will be increased and substitutes will be used in those few fields in which they are feasible, the pressure in copper demand would be taken off and the use of substitutes would thus become a balancing factor on the price of copper and copper products.

"STOCKPILING WOULD BE JEOPARDIZED BY REDUCING THE AVAILABLE SUPPLY OF COPPER

"The reimposition of the tax would have no appreciable effect on the amounts of copper available for either commercial imports or for Government stockpiling. Foreign nations, particularly Chile, are badly in need of dollars and will continue to supply the Amer-lean market with copper in order to gain much needed foreign exchange. The availability of copper for stockpiling would not be reduced by the 2-cent-per-pound tax.

"IT IS ARGUED THAT THE DOMESTIC INDUSTRY IS OPERATING AT PEAK PEACETIME PRODUCTION

"Although it is undoubtedly true that the rate of domestic production is high for normal peacetime conditions, it is also true that large numbers of the independent mines are closed, partly due to the price drop in 1949 following the suspension of the tax until June 30, 1950. The added production that can be brought into play by reopening these properties that have been reluctant to do so because of the uncertainty of the copper market has been estimated at 80,000 to 100,000 tons annually. The reason that these mines have refused to open are that in order to undergo the necessary expenses of reopening, a continued high price for copper would have to be assured. The reimposition of the 2-cent tax would represent a small factor, but an important factor, in assuring independent miners a return adequate to justify the expense of pumping water out of the mines and of retimbering the properties. As far as a consistently fair return for copper mining can be assured through the operation of the 2-cent tax, new-venture capital will go into copper mining, and exploration for new deposits will take place and thus assure the Nation a continued supply of copper. Only a healthy and operating industry can undergo the expense of exploration and development, and the 2-cent tax will, to a small degree, assure just that.

"NEW DISCOVERIES OF ORE DEPOSITS ARE NOT MADE AS FAST AS THE DEPLETION OF OLD ONES TAKES PLACE

"The same answer as above applies, plus the following: Coupled with new exploration and exploitation of deposits, there must be research for new technology which will make the use of low-grade deposits economically feasible. This research requires money and a healthy mining industry.

"FURTHER SUSPENSION OF COPPER TAX WOULD REDUCE THE PRICE OF COPPER

"Realizing that the 2 cents per pound tax is only a small part of the cost differential between domestic and foreign production, it is clear that the 2 cents per pound tax cannot completely stabilize copper prices. As was pointed out earlier, the domestic price of copper will probably soon approach the world price and just provide a cushion for extreme fluctuations of the domestic price.

"STOCKPILING COSTS WOULD BE INCREASED

"This was discussed earlier. Stockpiling can be done without payment of tariffs, and any argument that the security of the Nation would be endangered by this 2 cents per pound tax is dangerous and fallacious.

"In the hearings before the House, Mr. Phelps, vice president of Westinghouse Electric Corp., testified that Chile might reduce her exports to the United States by as much as 15 percent, irrespective of any such replacement of imports by increased domestic production.

"What made Mr. Phelps take the figure of 15 percent unless he was informed of such a figure by Chilean interests? Could this be regarded as a form of blackmail?

"INVESTMENT IN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE MINING INDUSTRY IS DEPENDENT UPON LONG-RANGE PRICE PICTURE, IRRESPECTIVE OF TARIFFS ON COPPER

"It is undeniably true that the development of copper mines and the prospecting in the industry is guided by the prospective price picture. We cannot argue that 2 cents per pound will guarantee the domestic producer a permanently high price. This low tariff will merely represent a small measure of protection. If we use the same factors today as we used in 1932 for the determination of the tariff necessary to compensate for the differences in the cost of production here and abroad, the copper tariff would have to be in the neighborhood of 8 cents per pound whereas in 1932 it was determined that 4 cents per pound would give domestic production adequate protection. The much more steeply rising costs in this country as compared with foreign production, and the devaluation of foreign currency, has brought about this change in the picture."

Senator MALONE. Mr. Chairman, I have a memo here of the effect of the copper tariff and the actual tariffs on copper products and I ask unanimous permission to insert that in the record.

"In talking with various Government agencies I found a general consensus of opinion that the reimposition of the excise tax will be reflected in the prices of semimanufactured goods containing copper. However, on many final copper products the effect will be so small as to be practically negligible, and all press reports that the consumers would suffer through higher prices must be regarded as grossly exaggerated.

"Here is an example of the incidence of the copper tariff on the retail price of an article such as a compact or a lipstick case made of copper or copper alloys: A compact made of brass weighing 2 ounces and assuming a copper content of 60 percent will contain 1.2 ounces of copper. At the present price of 22 cents per pound for copper the value of the actual copper contained in the compact would be worth approximately 1.65 cents. At a retail price of $1.65 for the compact only 1 percent of the retail price would be in payment for the actual copper used. If the tariff on copper were reimposed, the additional cost of 2 cents per pound for the tariff would represent an additional cost for the compact of 0.15 cent (15/100 of a cent), or approximately 0.001 percent of the retail price of the compact. Even assuming a great deal of waste of copper during the process of manufacture, one could hardly say that the increased cost of copper would be a hardship for the consumer.

"In general it must be said that the effect of reimposition of the copper tariff would be least noticeable in those commodities which require a great deal of labor in their production. It is pretty safe to say that the increased cost will be absorbed by the retailer, the jobber, or the manufacturer. However, there are other categories of goods which are heavier in weight and in which the actual copper cost represents a higher percentage of the final price. In housing, for instance, a great deal of copper is used for plumbing, heating, and other installation. If we assume that 250 pounds of copper are used in a house, the increased tax on copper would amount to $5 per house. If we realize that copper is generally only used to any great extent in houses in higher price brackets ($15,000 on up), the increased copper price will represent 0.033 percent of the total cost of a $15,000 house.

"The proponents of the further suspension of the copper tariff argue that any further increase in price may well lead to a further search for and use of a substitute for copper. In addition it is feared that any price slump that may occur in the copper industry will have more severe repercussions if the price is artificially hiked through the reimposition of the copper tariff. It is also argued that after the 1949 recession the copper industry is again working at, or near, capacity and that the reimposition of the tariff will not greatly increase domestic production of copper.

"During the last few years imports of copper have been necessary and it is considered hardly likely that at present consumption rates the tariff will change that picture significantly.

"As it was pointed out earlier, the reimposition of the tariff on copper will have no appreciable effect on the import situation at the present high prices. Should commodities wholesale, however, fall considerably on the world market, domestic copper producers would find themselves producing below the break-even point and copper purchasers would prefer to buy imported copper at lower prices. The 2-cent copper tariff, therefore, only represents a 2-cent per pound margin of safety for the domestic producer. Should world copper prices fall to more than 2 cents below the break-even point of domestic copper mines our copper industries would again largely suspend operations. It must be realized that domestic copper mines vary in their break-even point and that so-called marginal mines can only operate profitably at a high copper price and those would be the first to suspend operation in the case of a price break. The 2 cents per pound tariff would merely represent a 2-cent safety margin protecting the domestic market from excessively competitive imports. In regard to production cost foreign copper is produced at far lower rates than domestic copper and the 2-cent tariff only represents a small part of that difference in cost of production. This is a strong argument for the flexible import fee bill.

"In summing up, we may say that any fear of a significant increase in the price of commodities containing copper is without foundation. On the other hand, at the present condition of the domestic economy, it is doubted that the reimposition of the copper tariff will change the copper supply situation to any great extent. It must be added that in the case of a serious drop in copper price, the 2-cent per pound tariff may represent a small measure of protection for the domestic industry, although that amount of tariff is not enough to compensate for the much lower cost of production of imported copper.

"It has been found impossible to locate exact figures and examples of the effect of the copper tariff on the retail price of certain commodities. There are thousands and thousands of different products containing copper and it is almost impossible to find out what percentage of copper is contained in the products or in their alloys. It has been found, for instance, that in brass plumbing fixtures alone the percentages of contained copper vary from less than 60 percent to more than 90 percent. In the case of lipsticks, it is very difficult to find out how much of the cost of the lipstick must be apportioned to the case and how much to the actual lipstick; furthermore, the case may be made of any number of copper alloys and the actual chemical analysis would be almost impossible to obtain.

"The attached table lists articles which are dutiable under the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and which are taxable under the copper import excise tax for the copper contained therein. The tax of 2 cents per pound on the copper contained is levied in addition to the regular tariff. Any articles containing copper which are not provided for in paragraphs 316, 380, 381, 387, 1620, 1634, 1657, 1658, and 1659 of the Tariff Act of 1930, are taxable at the rate of 1½ cents per pound of the weight of the article if copper is the component of chief value. Articles which are not composed of copper as chief value, but which contain 4 percent or more of copper, are taxable, in addition to their regular duty, at the rate of 1½ percent ad valorem, or three-eights of a cent per pound, whichever is lower.

"In other words, all articles containing copper, specifically provided for in above paragraphs, are taxable for all copper contained. Other articles are taxed depending on whether they are in chief value of copper, or, if not, whether they contain 4 percent or more of copper. In either case, they are taxed, in addition to the normally applicable duty, on the weight of the article, and not on the copper contained."

SEVENTY TO EIGHTY PERCENT OF THE BRASS FABRICATORS' PRODUCTION CONTROLLED

Mr. Chairman, I want to say in closing that 70 to 80 percent of the fabricated brass production in this country is controlled by the three major mining companies, two of which are adamant that the free trade on copper be extended. On these same brass products containing 70 to 80 percent copper, a tariff or import fee of from a 15 to a 65 percent ad valorem is maintained which is necessary to pay American wages in this country and compete with the low-wage living standards in the competitive country, and to which I, of course, enter no objection. I am for a flexible tariff or import fee to stabilize the price at a competitive level for all products produced in the country.

QUESTION OF BUYING AT A SLAVE WAGE LEVEL

In my opinion we should not try the hold the price of the products that this Government buys from foreign nations down to a slave wage level. In my opinion we would have much better diplomatic relations, much better international relations, if we paid a price for these products that would allow them to pay their labor eventually on a scale comparable to our own instead of putting us in competition with this labor and insisting that we either put our men on relief or force them to work for a lower wage in this country.

And that goes for all the industries that I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, not only copper, because copper is merely a symbol—the tariff or subsidy is the alternative to putting our own men on relief, taking the subsidy money, the relief money out of the Treasury. Let us have an import-fee system so that we equalize the price differential so they can raise the wage living standards of their workers to our standard, to the extent that we purchase abroad. A good example is the situation in Chile, where copper producers get only 19.37 pesos for each United States dollar earned.

compared with a free market value of 90 pesos for the dollar. No wonder that wages in Chile are so low, when the Government retains most of the foreign exchange earnings.

Mr. Chairman, paying a price to foreign nations comparable to our own standard would be a very much improved method over the one we are using now which is a continual threat of removing what little floor under wages and investments exists.

Whenever the wage living standards reached the American level, no tariff or import fee would be necessary.

THE PURPOSE OF A TARIFF OR IMPORT FEE

The purpose of a tariff or import fee is a floor under wages and investments.

It means that regardless of the fluctuations in price there is a stabilized level below which it should not go, providing such tariff or import fee correctly represents that differential of cost between this Nation and the competitive countries mostly represented by the difference in the wage-living standards.

Whether the domestic production is 60 percent or 100 percent of the domestic consumption, the principle is the same, providing the tariff is based on the principle of "fair and reasonable" competition. A market then is established for foreign nations' goods on the same basis as for the domestic producer—but not at an advantage.

It simply supports the economic structure of our own country on the wage-living standards established by its own citizens. The principle, of course, should be applied to all products and all industries.

My flexible import fee bill, S. 1965, now in Senate Finance Committee, this very committee, provides that the long-experienced Tariff Commission would be turned into the Foreign Trade Authority, since this more nearly represents its work; and that Authority would have the same latitude in the field of adjusting the tariffs and import fees on a basis of "fair and reasonable" competition as the Interstate Commerce Commission was given the responsibility of fixing the freight rates for the carriers on the basis of a "reasonable return" on the investment.

THE "PERIL POINT" VERSUS THE FLEXIBLE IMPORT FEE

The much-discussed peril point would simply require the President to write Congress a letter in case the State Department lowered the tariff or import on any United States product below the Tariff Commission's estimate of the point of injury to domestic producers while the flexible import fee is established on principle. If we accept any provision of that nature we are then on record for the principle set out in the 1934 Trade Agreements Act as extended with the exercise of the President's judgment as it benefits abroad, overcoming the damage to industry in this country—and he is already on record that sacrificing an industry here is no reason to stop the indiscriminate handling of our own tariffs and import fees to provide additional imports into this country.

NO CONSIDERATION OF A HIGH OR LOW TARIFF

There would be no consideration of a high or low tariff or import fee, but the flexible import fee would at all times be adjusted to the differential of cost due mostly to the difference in the wage-living standards.

The tariff or import fee would be lowered as the foreign nations' living standards were raised, and when such standards approximated our own then the common objective of free and unrestricted trade would be the almost immediate and automatic result.

The tariff or import tax on copper has, unfortunately, been lowered from 4 cents to 2 cents, which is woefully inadequate, but nevertheless through its permanent restoration, the principle is established and venture capital and the workers in the industry would regain confidence that Congress is again operating upon a principle and not sharpshooting.

I want to thank the chairman and the committee for their kind attention, and I want to say if this comes to the floor I intend to debate it at some considerable length. I think it is time that the people of this country woke up, and I think they are waking up now. I have wires and resolutions from labor organizations, and I would ask permission to include those resolutions and wires that I have in my office, which are relatively few in number, in the record, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done.

(The documents referred to follow:)

"DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN POLICY RESOLUTION, NEVADA REPUBLICAN STATE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, 1950 AND 1952 PLATFORM, NOVEMBER 15, 1949

"The Nevada State Executive Committee passed an official resolution on November 15, 1949, offering the flexible import fee principle as a substitute for the 1934 Trade Agreements Act as amended—and called for the defeat of the International Trade Organization legislation—and for definite conditions on further gift-loans to Europe.

"The resolution:

"'Whereas the selective free-trade policy adopted by the State Department, based upon the Trade Agreements Act, is removing the floor from under wages and investments—causing unemployment and loss of taxable property; and

"'Whereas the proposed International Trade Organization, consisting of 53 nations, each with one vote, to which it is suggested that this Nation assign all of its right to adjust tariffs and import fees for the protection of the working men and investments in the United States of America, would complete the job of wrecking our economy; and

"'Whereas the policy of making up the trade balance deficits of the European nations (16 ECA nations) in cash each year without definite conditions for its utilization is simply reestablishing the century-old feud and rivalries among such nations: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That the Republican State Executive Committee of Nevada hereby adopts and recommends to the National Republican Committee for adoption an American domestic and foreign policy:

"'1. A domestic (national) policy.

"'A. The flexible import fee principle, based upon fair and reasonable competition, administered by a reorganized experienced Tariff Commission, to be known as the Foreign Trade Authority, in the same manner as the long-established Interstate Commerce Commission adjusts freight rates for the carriers on a basis of the principle laid down by Congress, of a reasonable return on the investments, to be substituted for the 1934 Trade Agreements Act as extended.

"'Under the flexible import fee principle a market is immediately established for the goods of foreign nations on a basis of fair and reasonable competition with our own—they cannot in good conscience ask for more.

"'2. A foreign (international) policy—as a condition of further aid to Europe.

"'A. Integrity of private investments.

"'B. A United States of Europe—including Germany without trade barriers of any kind.

"'C. Free convertibility of the European currencies in the terms of the dollar.

"'D. Equal access to the trade of the nations of the world—subject only to the action of such individual nations; be it further

"'Resolved, That the so-called bipartisan policy, including the support of the administration's three-part free-trade program has destroyed our traditional floor-under-wages policy and has contributed materially to the defeat of the Republican Party; and that the haphazard lowering of the import fees and tariffs, without regard to the differential of the cost of production due largely to the difference in living standards of this country and the foreign competitive nations, has severely injured the mining, petroleum, agricultural, textiles, pottery, lumber, precision instruments, and many other industries, thereby causing unusual unemployment and loss of taxable property; and that we are, by our own actions, removing the floor under wages and investments in this Nation and in effect transferring American jobs to foreign soil.'"

"EXCERPT FROM RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE THIRTIETH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NEVADA STATE FARM BUREAU, ELY, NEV., DECEMBER 2, 1949

"DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN POLICY

"'Resolution 17

"'Whereas the selective free-trade policy adopted by the State Department, based upon the Trade Agreements Act of 1934, as lowering the American living standards through the lowering of wages and is causing unemployment and a subsequent decline in the demand for agricultural products: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That the Nevada State Farm Bureau adopts and recommends that the American Farm Bureau Federation support a domestic and foreign policy containing the following features:

Under a flexible import fee principle, a market is immediately established for the goods of foreign nations on a basis of "fair and reasonable" competition with our own—other nations in good conscience cannot ask for more. DEAR SIR: By unanimous vote Pioche Union, Local No. 407, CIO, disapprove part 4 plan of the President which includes the International Trade Organization Agreement and urge that you do everything possible to substitute flexible import fee as outlined in your talk at Pioche, Nev., on December 15, 1949.

Yours truly,

"HELEN E. CRANER, Secretary."

Senator MALONE. Mr. Chairman, there never was a consistent "free trader"; in general, you will find that they want "free trade" on the material which they must buy and a tariff or import fee on the product that they must sell. Thus, there is a continual clash between industries, both of which must have the protection on the basis of "fair and reasonable" competition to pay American wages and stay in business.

A shining example is the brass fabricators, largely fronting for the owners of the foreign copper deposits, asking for "free trade" on copper, which makes up 70 to 90 percent of their raw material, while demanding a tariff or import fee of from 15 to 65 percent ad valorem on the brass fabricated products to meet the American wage standard of living. The three large copper producers own or control 75 to 80 percent of the brass fabricators in terms of output.

The workingmen and investors of this country will take things into their own hands when they finally realize that what we are doing is putting direct competition with the $2 labor, the $1-a-day labor, and the sweatshop labor of Europe, Asia, and Africa and other places. We can, however, protect our workers and investors if we take the differential of living standards into consideration through the tariff or import fee.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator MALONE. Thank you.

[1] The comparative price for coffee first 6 months of 1950 is based on the Associated Press Index for 35 leading commodities instead of the Bureau of Labor Wholesale Index. In spite of the current confusion about coffee prices, a direct comparison with 35 other leading commodities indicates clearly that coffee prices are at approximately the same level as other leading world commodities. Most of the reaction against the price of coffee results from the tremendous underpayment to coffee producers during the period 1938 to 1950.

National Health Insurance

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a condensation of speech given recently by Dr. Johannes U. Hoeber before the Torch Club of Philadelphia. Dr. Hoeber was born in Switzerland, educated at the Universities of Berlin and Heidelberg and the London School of Economics and Political Science. A resident of Philadelphia, he has served on the staff of the city charter committee of the Institute of Local and State Government at the University of Pennsylvania, as director of public relations of the Philadelphia Housing Authority, and as labor representative of the Community Chest. He is now director of the southern area of the Health and Welfare Council, Inc.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CASE FOR NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

(By Johannes U. Hoeber)

How to finance our Nation's medical bill has been a subject of hot debate for the past 20 years. Today the issue has become much narrower than it appeared to be only a few years ago. From Senator TAFT, of Ohio, to Senator TAYLOR, of Idaho, there is now agreement that some form of Government aid is needed in wide areas to maintain and improve the Nation's health. Medical services for the veterans, financial assistance for the construction of hospitals, grants-in-aid to medical schools, expansion of public-health services are no longer subjects of controversy. The practice of group medicine is no longer opposed by the medical profession, and even the principle of health insurance is now universally accepted.

The controversy has now narrowed down to one single issue: Should health insurance be sponsored by the Government and the extent of its coverage determined by law, or should it be voluntary and left entirely to the free choice of the individual?

If the American people are to make an intelligent choice between these alternatives, two obstacles must be removed which now obscure from the view of the general public the true merits of the case on either side.

The first of these obstacles are the propaganda slogans. This is not the life-and-death struggle between socialism and free enterprise as it is being depicted by the American Medical Association and its allies. Nobody would call our public schools socialist because they are owned and operated by units of government; and our home-building industry certainly continues to regard itself as private enterprise although a large segment of its operations is dependent upon the mortgage guaranties of the Federal Government. The tags of socialism and free enterprise, in this as in other fields, serve only to confuse instead of to identify the issues.

PUBLIC SHOULD BE HEARD

The second obstacle is the failure of the general public to participate in this debate. Voluntary versus Government insurance is not a medical issue. On how to practice medicine, nobody is qualified to speak but the medical expert; but how to pay for medical services is as much, if not more, the concern of the consumer of these services—99.9 percent of our population—as it is that of the 150,000 physicians engaged in the private practice of medicine. To select the best system of health insurance calls for the special knowledge of the economist, the tax expert, the student of government and public administration, the actuary. The voice of the American Medical Association should not carry any more weight in this debate than that of the United Automobile Workers or the American Association of Social Workers.

What, then, are the facts? What is proposed by the advocates of national health insurance? What is offered by the existing voluntary plans?

Following President Truman's special message on the Nation's health, the National Health Insurance and Public Health Act was introduced into Congress in April 1949. Title VII of this act proposes to expand the social-security system by adding health insurance to the existing old age, survivors' and unemployment insurance. The bill proposes to cover approximately 85 percent of the population including both employees and self-employed persons, and their dependents. Persons covered by insurance would be entitled to medical services by general practitioners and specialists at their homes, in the doctor's office, and in hospitals; to hospital care up to 60 days per year; to laboratory and X-ray services, costly prescribed medicines, eyeglasses, special appliances, and certain amounts of dental services and home nursing. Patients would be free to select the doctor, dentist, and hospital of their own choice; doctors, dentists, and hospitals would be free to join or not to join the insurance system and to accept or reject individual patients. The program would be administered by the States and their subdivisions (counties and municipalities).

Administration at the local level would be put into the hands of local boards appointed in accordance with State law and composed of local citizens, including members of the medical profession. The role of the Federal Government would be limited to the collection of the health-insurance fund for distribution to the States. A Federal board composed of five persons would establish certain general requirements with which State programs would have to conform. Doctors would be paid from the health-insurance fund on a fee-for-service, capitation, or salary basis, depending on what system of payment the participating doctors in each locality would choose for themselves. The program would be financed by a special tax of 3 percent on all incomes up to $4,800 a year. Self-employed persons would pay the full amount themselves; employees would pay 1½ percent themselves; and the other 1½ percent would be paid by their employers.

A large number of voluntary health-insurance plans are now in existence. For purposes of comparison, the combined Blue Cross-Blue Shield plan of the Associated Hospital Service of Philadelphia and the Medical Service Association of Pennsylvania is used as a typical example of the best that voluntary health insurance has to offer.

Maximum benefits under the Blue Cross plan include 30 days of hospitalization for each different ailment requiring admission to a hospital in any one year. Hospital service is provided in the lowest-cost semiprivate room available at the time of admission; it includes all services rendered by salaried employees of the hospital and all drugs in general use. X-ray examination, laboratory examination, etc., are limited to certain maximum amounts. Hospital care for patients suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis or mental or nervous disorders is limited to 10 days. Conditions existing prior to enrollment are not covered during the first 12 months. Maternity benefits are provided up to $75 a year after the subscriber has been enrolled for 12 months.

The medical-surgical plan of the Blue Shield provides surgical services up to $200 a year according to the Blue Shield schedule of surgical payments regardless of whether the surgical operation is performed at home, at the doctor's office, or in a hospital. Medical services are paid hospitalized patients up to 70 days at the rate of $10 for the first, $5 for the second, and $3 for the remaining days. Medical service at the patient's home or the doctor's office are covered up to 21 visits at $3 per visit starting with the fourth visit, if the subscriber is a member of an affiliated employee group and is disabled by illness. Medical treatment for mental, TB, and VD cases is limited to 30 days in a hospital.

Doctors participating in the Blue Shield plan are allowed to make additional charges over and above those paid for by Blue Shield if the annual income of a subscriber with two or more dependents is more than $4,000.

The cost of this combined Blue Cross-Blue Shield plan for a family including husband, wife, and all unmarried children under 19 years of age is $6.10 a month or $73.20 a year.

Disregarding differences in benefits, which will be discussed later, a comparison of the costs of health insurance under the two plans for three different levels of income is shown by the table at the bottom of this page.

No comparison is possible for incomes over $4,000 a year because Blue Shield permits doctors to charge unspecified additional amounts.

As far as benefits are concerned, these are some of the major differences between the two plans:

Blue Cross provides for hospitalization for 30 days for any one ailment; National Health Insurance for 60 days per year. Hospital care for TB or mental patients is limited by Blue Cross to 10 days. Maternity benefits, X-ray examinations, and laboratory examinations are limited by Blue Cross-Blue Shield to hospitalized patients and to certain maximum amounts; they are not limited under National Health Insurance.

Blue Shield does not cover any medical services unless the subscriber is disabled by illness (i. e., required to stay home from work) and does not cover the first three visits at the patient's home or the doctor's office even though the subscriber cannot go to work.

This is probably the most serious shortcoming of the voluntary plans. If the old adage, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" has any validity, voluntary health insurance as offered today contributes nothing to that part of our total medical bill that is most vital from the standpoint of the Nation's health; the cost of preventive medicine. Voluntary insurance as offered today is sickness insurance and not health insurance.

More serious than the gaps in the coverage provided by voluntary plans to the individual subscriber is the failure of these plans to enroll, at least so far, enough subscribers to justify their claim that they can do the whole job. According to the AMA's own figures, only 13,000,000 people, or less than 9 percent of the total population have comprehensive Blue Cross (hospitalization), Blue Shield (medical-surgical), or similar coverage. An additional 21,000,000 have hospitalization and surgical coverage, and 27,000,000 have only Blue Cross (hospitalization) coverage. (At the end of 1949 only 5 percent of the population of Pennsylvania were Blue Shield members).

Moreover, present subscribers are very unevenly distributed geographically and economically. In May 1949, about 60 percent of all Blue Cross policies were held by citizens of six rich industrial States of the East and Midwest. Only 17 percent of Blue Cross members lived in Southern and Western States with 43 percent of the population. Only 3 percent of the rural population were covered.

The members of voluntary insurance plans are the industrial and clerical employees in the East and Midwest. A large share of the credit for enrolling so many of them in recent years belongs to the trade-unions which have won health-insurance benefits through collective bargaining. At the same time, the advances gained by union members in this field are threatening to disturb the competitive equilibrium between the various parts of our economy in the same way in which it has been disturbed by wage differentials in the past and more recently by the spread of private pension funds. If this trend continues, we may some day see the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce retreat from their position against national health insurance just as they have retreated recently from their former opposition against the broadening of social security.

It would be highly desirable if the American people—all of them—could be induced to insure themselves voluntarily against the cost of medical care; but is it realistic to assume that this ideal can ever be reached? Americans have an innate desire to pay for what they get. They despise charity. That is why any system based on the means test will never become law. That is why people risk sickness rather than being charity patients. Are we not expecting too much if we assume that the head of a family who can barely stretch his pay check to cover the cost of food, clothing, and shelter would part voluntarily with $6 a month for health insurance? That the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak is clearly demonstrated by the fact that the American people spend each year more money for liquor, for entertainment, and for other luxuries than they spend for medical care. Is it really socialistic and communistic to help the spirit along by using the democratic process of legislation to give the Nation's health priority over other less vital needs?

Resistance against anything that bears the label of "compulsion" is one of the strongest—and healthiest—traits in our national character. Opponents of national health insurance have used the compulsory feature of the plan as one of the most effective weapons to whip up sentiment against this piece of legislation. Yet compulsion is the very essence of every law imposed on the individual by the community—from the traffic ordinance to the Constitution of the United States. Once it is admitted, as proponents and opponents of the program do, that health is a matter of legitimate national concern, compulsion becomes as appropriate in this field as in the fields of civil rights, education, social security, or the protection of life and property of the individual and the community at home and abroad.

In April 1934, at a time when the American Medical Association was fighting voluntary health insurance as "socialism and communism inciting to revolution," it issued the following statement:

"Without some form of compulsion voluntary insurance fails of its objective of distributing the cost of sickness among large classes of the population with even approximate fairness. The young and healthy will not join and the aged and sickly, if accepted, will raise the cost to a prohibitive point and, if rejected, remove protection from those most in need. Sickness insurance cannot distribute the burden of sickness unless it is compulsory."

We might well rest our case for national health insurance on this statement.

Hagen's Long-Range Flood-Control Plan Under Way for Valley Area—Many Projects Started, Others Planned

OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, one of the problems of greatest importance to my people in Minnesota's Ninth District is the flood problem. Therefore, as the Congress nears adjournment I ask permission to report to them on some of the work I have accomplished and the legislation that I have introduced on their behalf during recent months and years.

This spring one of the greatest disasters in the history of our Nation struck the Red River Valley of the North. Surging floodwaters of the Red River and its tributaries swept over 1,100,000 acres of Minnesota and North Dakota. Another 2,000,000 acres of fertile and productive land were inundated because of inadequate drainage. United States Army engineers, in a report of August 19, said that about $33,000,000 damage was done in the flood.

I returned to my district twice by airplane during the floods. My purpose was twofold—to help out in their hour of need and to get first-hand information that would guide me in working out my relief and reconstruction program of legislation.

On my return to Washington, I immediately began introducing the following bills and resolutions in the Congress:

APRIL 27

H. R. 8264: A bill to provide for the modification of certain recommendations relating to flood control on the Red River of the north and its tributaries, to include the construction of additional flood-control improvements.

H. R. 8265: A bill to provide for a preliminary examination and survey of the Buffalo River in Minnesota for flood control purposes.

H. R. 8266: A bill to provide for the construction of a flood-control and hydroelectric dam on the Red Lake River about 3 miles west of Red Lake Falls.

H. R. 8278: A bill to provide for the reconstruction and repair of roads and other public facilities in Minnesota which were destroyed or damaged by recent floods.

APRIL 28

H. R. 8296: A bill to increase the emergency fund for the President from $1,000,000 to $20,000,000.

MAY 3

H. R. 8341: A bill calling for funds for the reconstruction and repair of roads, bridges, culverts, drainage ditches, and other public facilities destroyed or damaged as a result of the recent floods.

MAY 10

H. R. 8461: A bill to authorize Federal financial assistance to States and local governments in major disasters. It authorizes funds to supplement State or local aid in alleviating suffering and damage and for restoring and repairing public facilities. This covers disasters in any part of the Nation and, of course, includes the 1950 Red River Valley floods.

Mr. Speaker, you will note that the bills above—especially those at the top of the list—tie in with the long-range program previously approved by Congress, and designed to get at the very roots of the problem.

My original long-range flood-control program, to a great extent provided in H. R. 6149, which was approved by Congress early in 1948, provides a suitable series of dams, levees, and reservoirs, and other flood projects that will prevent these annual major or even minor flood disasters.

There will be a dam and reservoir about 6 miles southwest of Fergus Falls with a capacity of 14,100 acre-feet of water. This has been approved and construction may get under way this fall or early next spring. This will reduce flood flows in the lower Otter Tail River, and in time of drought increase low-water flows in coordination with the Baldhill Dam and Reservoir and the Red River of the North. Other dams and reservoirs are recommended for several rivers in North Dakota and northwestern Minnesota.

Then the main stem of the Bois de Sioux River will be straightened and cleared; the main channel around Fargo and Moorhead will be cleared and enlarged and deepened with levees 1,800 feet long at Moorhead and about 1 mile long at Fargo. At East Grand Forks there will be channel clearing for 16 miles with deepening and straightening. My long-range plan calls for a levee 6,700 feet long in the southern part of Grand Forks and a levee and flood wall 9,600 feet long in East Grand Forks.

The Wild Rice and Marsh Rivers will be straightened, deepened, and widened. This project is under construction at the present time.

The Sand Hill River Basin will be enlarged shortly, and improvements on other streams tributary to the Red River and Red Lake-Clearwater Rivers carried out in the coming years. One of the important projects scheduled for early action is the Lost River project.

Flood-control projects eventually will be undertaken on the streams in Marshall and Kittson Counties which flow into the Red River of the North.

The Roseau River project has been reopened by my efforts, and a feasible and practical Federal flood-control project is expected.

For 40 years many persons in northwestern Minnesota had attempted to get the money to undertake the Red Lake-Clearwater flood-control project. But it was only in the Eightieth Congress that success finally came—when I led the campaign for Federal funds. The projects are now nearing completion.

In the present Eighty-first Congress, my bill introduced April 27, 1950, calls for construction of a dam on the Red Lake River about 3 miles west of Red Lake Falls at or near the site known as Huot or Cyr Rapids. This dam, and the reservoir it creates, can be used for both flood control and for hydroelectric power. There also are other suitable sites for reservoirs or for power.

Perhaps the legislation of most timely interest to the people of Minnesota's Ninth District at this time, from the list above, is the national disaster bill. Both the late Representative William Lemke, of North Dakota and I had introduced similar measures. After the death of my good friend and colleague, Mr. Lemke, I piloted his disaster bill through the legislative channels as a mark of respect to his memory. This measure became known as the Hagen-Lemke bill—H. R. 8396.

The Hagen-Lemke bill, under certain conditions and limitations, provides $5,000,000 to relieve suffering and repair public facilities after a disaster. It also authorizes the President to coordinate the activities of all Federal agencies in such an emergency.

The Hagen-Lemke disaster bill was approved by the House of Representatives on August 7, 1950. Several times that afternoon I was asked to yield the floor for comments and questions on the bill. These two short quotes are taken from the comments of my colleagues on the floor.

Representative JUDD:

I should like to commend my distinguished colleague from Minnesota on behalf of the other Members from Minnesota and North Dakota for the lead that he has taken and the persistence he has demonstrated in bringing this important matter to a favorable vote today. Naturally he was especially interested this year because the most recent and severe flood was in his district. But he has been a pioneer in the field long before this year's disaster.

Representative ANDRESEN:

I recognize the months that Mr. HAGEN has spent in hard work to try to secure worthwhile legislation to aid in rehabilitating that part of his area so hard hit by floods. No man in Congress has done as much as he has in trying to bring a solution to this problem.

I am also happy to report at this time that my other bills relating to flood reconstruction and control are progressing satisfactorily. Many of them have already received favorable reports from full committees—others favorable reports from subcommittees. And I need not remind my people of Minnesota's Ninth District that world conditions have slowed down action on some of these bills. I am sure that they are aware of the fact that top priority is being given to military and defense measures since the situation in Korea began developing early this summer.

As Mr. JUDD stated in his remarks above, I have long had a prime interest in this flood problem. Through the years that I have been in Washington it has been of greatest concern to me. The countless hours I have labored on the problem, the bulging flood correspondence files in my office, and the many messages of appreciation from both my constituents and colleagues lend proof to that fact.

There is, of course, no such thing as partisan lines when one is working with a problem of such vital importance. My dealings and extensive correspondence with the White House on flood matters attest to that fact. I regret that anyone in my district, who might talk of partisanship, was not present at our White House conference with President Truman on June 14, 1950. It was left up to me to see who should be included in the conference, since I called it and arranged it. I invited all of the Minnesota and North Dakota Members of the House of Representatives. I also invited Senators THYE and HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, and Senators LANGER and YOUNG, of North Dakota. Governor Youngdahl arrived in the Capital that morning, so I invited him. All of these men accepted the invitation and attended the conference. Senator HUMPHREY, at my request, was spokesman for the group.

Here I wish to quote a portion of an editorial printed in the Crookston (Minn.) Times on May 23, 1950, under the heading of "Careless charges by DFL convention":

It is absurd to speak of Congressman HAGEN as seeking to jump the gun on getting relief for flood victims, and it is sheer political quackery for such a claim to come from the opposition party.

Thus far there has been no word from Senator HUMPHREY regarding any failure on the part of HAROLD HAGEN to live up to promised bipartisan work. As HUMPHREY said in an interview with a Times reporter, "We are working together as a team." None of the members of the team has cast any charges at his teammates. It does not behoove the partisan supporters of HUMPHREY in the ninth district to go so contrary to the path set by their leader.

Let's not start playing politics with flood-control efforts.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this report has given the people of my district a clear picture on flood relief and reconstruction measures. I have been guided in my work on behalf of my people in this flood legislation by these eight words: "The need is great—the cause is just."

Opposing Reduction of Tariff Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of Senate Resolution 355, opposing reduction of tariff rates during the effective period of the Defense Production Act of 1950. This resolution was introduced on September 20, 1950, by the junior Senator from Nevada and referred to the Committee on Finance, where it is now pending.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Resolution 355

Whereas American industry is now operating under emergency regulations and controls; and

Whereas it is unfair to American industry and labor to flood this market with foreign competitive items while American industry and labor is engaged in the production for our armed services; and

Whereas the further reduction of tariff rates under the present uncertain conditions causes venture capital to withdraw from the field of investment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that all negotiations and conferences under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, which might result in the loss of revenue to the United States Treasury be postponed so long as the Defense Production Act of 1950 is in force and effect.

Bender Says 1950 Congressional Elections Are Key to World Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following talk by the Honorable George H. Bender, former Representative at Large from Ohio:

BENDER SAYS 1950 CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS ARE KEY TO WORLD AFFAIRS

George H. Bender, Republican condidate for Congressman at Large, speaking at Warren, Ohio, before the Trumbull County Republican organization on Wednesday, October 4, 1950, declared that the 1950 congressional elections are the key to the entire world situation for the next 4 years. Mr. Bender said:

"The congressional elections of 1950 throughout the Nation are of more than immediate importance. This November our people will be electing one-third of the membership of the Senate as well as the entire House of Representatives. By one of the quirks of fate, most of the Senate seats being contested this year are in the Northern, Middle Western, and Western States. Thirty-two Senate seats are up for election now. Twenty of these are now held by Democrats and 12 by Republicans. If there is to be any change in our Government it will come only if our Congress is changed, and this means a change in the Senate as well as in the House.

"The time to make this change must be in 1950, because 2 years from now the Senators who come up for election will include a majority of Republicans. This is the crucial congressional election for the next 4 years.

"Our entire foreign policy is at stake in the voting on November 7. If we have another rubber-stamp Democratic Congress, it will do everything in its power to conceal deficiencies in our defenses, to minimize the strength of Communist influence in our Government, and to pretend that everything is quiet on the western front when we are sitting on a powder keg.

"The record speaks for itself. Under the present national administration, with its subservient Congress, there has been a consistent effort to play down all of our Government's tragic blunders and incredible errors of judgment. If you were to listen to Democrats in Congress, the Alger Hiss case was nothing, the outright stealing of secret State documents and their publication in a pro-Soviet magazine was just a prank, and the confession of Pressman that he had been a member of a Communist cell when he was working for our Government was not even worth noticing.

"Fortunately there are others in Washington who believe that these episodes are not isolated. There are Republicans who believe that these revelations are closely related to the tragedy of China, to our surrender at Potsdam, and to the chaos which prevails all over the world today.

"We want to do something to clean up this mess. We can start doing it on election day by voting for a Republican Congress."

(3) That any registrant who, on the eighteenth anniversary of the date of his birth is successfully and satisfactorily pursuing a standard course of study, on a full-time basis in a high school or a similar institution of learning shall, if he so requests, be entitled to have his induction or assignment under this title postponed until his graduation therefrom, or until he ceases to pursue satisfactorily such course of study, or until he attains the twentieth anniversay of the date of his birth, whichever occurs first, except that any such registrant whose induction or assignment has been so postponed shall be liable for training until he attains the twenty-sixth anniversary of the date of his birth;

(4) That under rules and regulations promulgated by the Director with the approval of the Commission, there are hereby authorized deferments from training under this title, for extreme hardship, physical or mental disability, or reasons vital to the national interest;

(5) That under policies established by the Director with the approval of the Commission, every registrant shall, prior to induction, be physically and mentally examined,

(6) That the President is authorized to postpone or exempt the induction of such groups or number of registrants as are necessary in order to limit inductions to the maximum number which can be trained by training agencies designated by the Commission;

(7) That no registrant under this title shall be liable for training under this title who (a) is now serving or has heretofore served honorably for at least 1 year in any of the Armed Forces of the United States in active Federal service or of the Armed Forces of any nation allied with the United States at any time during World War II; or (b) shall hereafter enter into any of the Armed Forces of the United States on active duty, and complete a minimum of 1 year honorable service therein; or (c) is enlisted and is serving, on the effective date of this title, in any one of the following Reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States: (1) The federally recognized National Guard of the United States and Air National Guard of the United States; (2) the Organized Reserve of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard: Provided, That in either case failure to complete such current enlistment shall render such person liable to induction and training until he attain the twenty-sixth anniversary of the date of his birth; or (d) on the effective date of this title is a cadet of the United States Military Academy, a midshipman of the United States Naval Academy, a cadet of the United States Coast Guard Academy, a midshipman of the United States Merchant Marine Academy, or of a Navy-accredited State Maritime Academy, a member of the Senior Division Reserve Officers' Training Corps, or Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, or Air Reserve Officers' Training Corps, or the naval aviation college program, so long as he satisfactorily continues in and completes 2 years training therein: Provided, That until such time as the President determines that the program has reached full-scale implementation, the Commission may conditionally exempt from induction or conditionally discharge from training any registrant or trainee who has been accepted for admittance to any of the academies or training programs enumerated, in order that such person may enter such academy or training program wherein he shall complete not less than 2 years of training in order to be relieved of liability for induction or further training hereunder. SEC. 134. (a) Subject to such quota limitations and standards of qualification and selection as may be established by the Secretary of Defense to insure a proper balance of trained manpower between the ground, air, and naval arms, each registrant eligible for military training shall be entitled to request and receive training in the service of his choice, and shall be classified therein by his local board. Each registrant found not to be eligible for military training shall, subject to such quota limitations and standards of qualification as may be established by the Commission, be entitled to request and receive training in the nonmilitary training program of his choice, and shall be classified therein by the local board: Provided, That any such person claiming exemption from combatant training, because of religious training and belief as defined in section 6 (j) of the Selective Service Act of 1948, as amended, and whose claim is sustained by the local board shall, when inducted or assigned under this title, be required to elect training in such other available training program of his choice as provided herein subject to such quotas and standards as may be established.

(b) Any person claiming exemption from combatant training shall, if such claim is not sustained by the local board, be entitled to an appeal to the appropriate appeal board. Upon the filing of such appeal with the appeal board, the appeal board shall forthwith refer the matter to the Department of Justice for inquiry and hearing. The Department of Justice, after appropriate inquiry, shall hold a hearing with respect to the character and good faith of the objections of the person concerned, and such person shall be notified of the time and place of such hearing. The Department of Justice shall, after such hearing, if the objections are found to be sustained, recommend to the appeal board that when the objector is inducted or assigned for training under this act, he be required to elect training as provided in (a) above. If after such hearing the Department of Justice finds that his objections are not sustained, it shall recommend to the appeal board that such objections be not sustained. The appeal board shall give consideration to, but shall not be bound to follow, the recommendation of the Department of Justice together with the record on appeal from the local board, in making its decision. Each person whose claim for exemption from combatant training because of religious training and belief as herein defined is sustained, shall be listed by the local board on a register of conscientious objectors.

SEC. 135. (b) Each local board shall maintain a register of registrants, which shall contain a current record of the address, occupational, dependency, training and service status, and such other information as may be required for the periods specified in (a) above.

SEC. 138. Funds appropriated to the Selective Service System shall be available in the case of registrants who prior to their induction into the National Security Training Corps suffer illness, injury, or death while acting under orders issued under the provisions of this title, for the payment of actual and reasonable expenses of (1) emergency medical care including hospitalization, and (2) recovery of body, preparation for burial, including suitable casket, transportation to the home of the deceased or to a cemetery designated by his nearest relative or proper authority, and interment, but such burial expenses shall not exceed $150 in any one case.

SEC. 139. Any person having and exercising any authority under this title, who shall knowingly make, or be a party to the making of, any false, improper, or incorrect registration, classification, physical or mental examination, deferment, enrollment, or muster; or any person who shall knowingly make, or be a party to the making of, any false statement or certification as to his fitness or unfitness or liability or nonliability for training under the provisions of this title, or who otherwise evades or refuses registration, induction, or training or any of the requirements of this title; or any person who knowingly counsels, aids, or abets another to refuse or evade registration, induction, or training, or any of the requirements of this title, or any person or persons who shall knowingly hinder or interfere or attempt to do so in any way by force or violence with the administration of this title; or any person or persons who conspire to commit one or more of such offenses; or any person selected for training under this title who shall refuse to complete the training as prescribed under this title, shall upon conviction in the district court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 5 years or by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Precedence shall be given by courts to the trial of cases arising under this title, and such case shall, upon request of the Attorney General, be advanced on the docket for immediate hearing.

SEC. 140. (a) Nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 231 and 283), or in section 190 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed to apply to any person because of his appointment under authority of this title and the regulations pursuant thereto, as an uncompensated member of the Selective Service System, or as an individual to conduct hearings on appeals of persons claiming exemption from training because of conscientious objections.

(b) All functions performed under this title shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237) except as to the requirements of section 3 of such act.

SEC. 141. No individual who has been convicted of any crime not punishable by death, and no individual who has been committed to jail, corrective institution, or institution for juvenile delinquency, shall by reason of such conviction or commitment be relieved from liability for training under this title, but may be trained as directed by the Commission.

SEC. 143. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums to each department or organization performing functions under the provisions of this title as may be necessary to enable it to perform its said functions.

SEC. 144. The Commission shall report semiannually to the Congress all expenditures of appropriations in detail.

SEC. 145. If any provision of titles I, II, or III of the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of said titles, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 146. The Secretary of Defense shall submit recommendations to the President as to the time and rate of implementation of the training program established pursuant to the provisions of this act. The recommendations shall take into consideration the intent of the Congress that operations under this act shall not interfere with the immediate increasing of the components of the Armed Forces to their authorized strength.

TITLE II

CODE OF CONDUCT

SEC. 201. Title: This title shall be known as the Code of Conduct (hereinafter referred to as the "code") for the military training program of the National Security Training Corps.

SEC. 202. Statement of policy: Any act or omission of a trainee, as herein defined, which tends to hinder or impede his training is hereby declared to be contrary to the purposes of title I and this title. The disciplinary punishment of trainees of the military training program as hereinafter provided shall be consistent with the maintenance of discipline.

SEC. 203. All trainees subject to provisions: All trainees, as herein defined, shall, from the time of actual induction and while serving on active training duty, as herein defined, be subject to the provisions of this code.

SEC. 204. Definitions: The following words when used in this code shall be construed in the sense indicated in this section unless the context shows that a different sense is intended:

(a) The word "trainee" shall be deemed to mean a person inducted into the National Security Training Corps and assigned to a component of the Armed Forces for training under the provisions of title I of this act during the period of his active training duty.

(b) The words "active training duty" shall be deemed to mean that period of training commencing with the day of induction into the corps and consisting of the period of basic military training in accordance with title I of this act and ending with the completion or earlier termination of such basic training, and in addition the optional additional military training provided in section 125 (c) (1) of title I.

(c) The word "officer" shall be deemed to mean a commissioned officer.

(d) The words "civil authorities" shall be deemed to mean law-enforcement authorities of the United States and of the Territories and possessions, and authorities of the several States, including political subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia.

(e) The words "commanding officer" shall be deemed to mean an officer of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, including the Reserve components thereof, who is empowered to exercise command of any detachment or company of trainees, or similar or higher units.

(f) The words "appointing authority" shall be deemed to mean (1) an officer of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, including the Reserve components thereof, who commands a trainee regiment, or comparable unit; or (2) superior military training authority.

(g) The words "reviewing authority" shall be deemed to mean an officer of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, including the Reserve components thereof, who is next superior in the chain of command to the commanding officer of the accused as defined in this title and who also is empowered to convene general courts martial.

(h) The words "staff judge advocate" shall be deemed to mean an officer of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, including the Reserve components thereof, who is a lawyer assigned to a reviewing authority to perform law duties.

(i) The words "superior military training authority" shall be deemed to mean an officer of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or the Marine Corps, including the Reserve components thereof, superior in the chain of command.

(j) The words "extra duty" shall be deemed to mean additional work or duty of any nature assigned to trainees as punishment.

(k) The term "military law" shall be construed to mean the laws governing the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps of the United States.

SEC. 205. Mode of enforcing discipline: Violations of this code shall be punishable in the discretion of the commanding officer (a) by disciplinary punishment administered by the commanding officer of the accused, unless the accused shall request trial, or (b) by national security training courts. Trainees shall be likewise subject to prosecution in the courts of the United States and of the Territories and possessions and of the District of Columbia for crimes and offenses against the United States, and in the courts of the several States for crimes and offenses against the States or any subdivision thereof.

SEC. 206. Disciplinary punishment by unit commander: A commanding officer of a trainee company or higher command may, for minor violations of this code, impose disciplinary punishments upon trainees of his command without the intervention of a national security training court unless the accused requests trial by that court. Punishment assessed by a commanding officer shall not constitute time lost to training within the meaning of section 278 hereof, and shall operate as a bar to subsequent trial for the same offense.

The disciplinary punishment authorized by this section may include admonition, reprimand, withholding of privileges for not exceeding 1 week, extra duty for not exceeding 1 week, restriction to certain specified limits for not exceeding 1 week, but shall not include forfeiture of cash allowance or confinement under guard. A trainee punished under authority of this section who deems the punishment unjust or disproportionate to the offense may appeal to the next superior military training authority, but may in the meantime be required to undergo the punishment adjudged.

The commanding officer who imposes the punishment, his successor in command, or superior military training authority shall have power to mitigate or remit any unexecuted portion of the punishment.

SEC. 207. National security training court: A national security training court shall be composed of any number of officers of the service to which the trainee is assigned for training, of which three shall be a quorum, one of which three shall be a major or lieutenant commander or above. The senior member of the court shall be the president. One member of the court, if practicable, shall be a lawyer and shall act as a law member of the court. In the event no member of the court is a lawyer, the president thereof shall act as law member. Trials of trainees for violations of trainee discipline hereinafter set forth may be by a national security training court, which shall not include the accuser or the immediate commanding officer of the accused or the investigating officer or a witness for the prosecution or the defense.

SEC. 208. Appointing authority: A national security training court may be appointed by an appointing authority as herein defined.

SEC. 209. Who may serve on national security training courts: All officers of the service to which the trainee is assigned for training shall be competent to serve on a national security training court. When appointing such court, the appointing authority shall detail as members thereof those officers of the command who, in his opinion, are best qualified for such duty by reason of age, training, experience, and judicial temperament. Officers having less than 2 years' service shall not, if it can be avoided without manifest injury to the corps, be appointed as members of a court in excess of minority membership thereof.

SEC. 210. Influencing the court: Any attempt on the part of any member of the Armed Forces to influence, by any unauthorized means, a national security training court or its members, or to admonish, censure, or reprimand the court or its members for any act or omission, is hereby prohibited and shall constitute an offense against military law.

SEC. 211. Appointment of trial counsel and defense counsel: For each national security training court the appointing authority shall appoint a trial counsel and defense counsel, who shall, if practicable, be lawyers: Provided, That if the trial counsel is a lawyer, the appointed defense counsel must also be a lawyer. No person who has acted as investigating officer or court member in any case shall act subsequently as trial counsel or, unless expressly requested by the accused, as defense counsel in the same case. No person who has acted for the prosecution shall act subsequently in the same case for the defense, nor shall any person who has acted for the defense act subsequently in the same case for the prosecution.

The accused shall have the right to be represented in his defense by civilian counsel if provided by him, or by military counsel of his own selection if reasonably available or by the duly appointed defense counsel.

SEC. 212. Jurisdiction of national security training courts: A national security training court shall have jurisdiction to try and punish any trainee for any offense made punishable by this code.

SEC. 213. Allowable punishments by a national security training court: The punishments authorized by this code upon conviction of a trainee for any offense herein made punishable shall consist of any of the following punishments and no others: Admonition, reprimand, withholding of privileges for not to exceed 3 months, extra duty for not to exceed 3 months, restriction to certain specified limits with or without extra duty, for not to exceed 3 months, and confinement with or without useful work for not to exceed 3 months, and forfeiture or withholding of one-half of the cash allowance per month, for not to exceed the period of confinement, when a trainee is confined pursuant to sentence of a national security training court, and where specifically authorized, bad conduct discharge or dishonorable discharge: Provided, That admonition, reprimand, or bad conduct discharge, or dishonorable discharge may be included together with or in addition to any of the other punishments allowed under this section.

SEC. 214. Arrest: A trainee charged with an offense may be placed under arrest or in confinement, as circumstances may require, but when charged with a minor offense only, a trainee shall not ordinarily be placed in confinement. Only a commanding officer or superior military training authority or an officer duly designated as his representative shall have power to place a trainee in, or release him from confinement. Any commissioned officer shall have authority to place a trainee in arrest. The arresting officer, the commanding officer of the trainee or superior military training authority shall have authority to release a trainee from arrest.

SEC. 215. Preferring charges: Any person subject to the provisions of titles I and II of this act or military law may prefer charges, which shall be under oath that he has personal knowledge of or has investigated the matters set forth therein and that the same are true in fact to the best of his knowledge and belief. The charges shall be set forth upon a charge sheet and shall be in the form of a charge setting forth the alleged violation, together with a specification. In the event a trainee is placed under arrest or in confinement, charges shall be filed within 48 hours of the time thereof. Otherwise a trainee shall be released from such arrest or confinement unless the commanding officer, acting upon the recommendation of an officer duly designated by the appointing authority to conduct a preliminary hearing or investigation, and who having conducted or begun to conduct such a hearing or investigation at which the trainee is present and informed of the grounds of his confinement recommends that the accused be not released, directs that the arrest or confinement be continued.

SEC. 216. Action by commanding officer: Charges will be filed with the trainee's immediate commanding officer, who will inquire into the facts and circumstances of the case and expeditiously dispose of the matter or without delay forward the charges together with the names of the witnesses and a statement of their prospective testimony with his written recommendations to the appointing authority.

SEC. 217. Forwarding charges; delays; service of charges: Unless the charges are disposed of without trial, the unit commanding officer shall, within 48 hours after accused is arrested or confined, if practicable, forward the charges to the appointing authority. If the same be not practicable, he shall report to superior authority the reason for delay. The unit commanding officer shall cause to be delivered to the accused a copy of the charges.

SEC. 218. Action by appointing authority: The appointing authority, in his discretion, may refer the chargers for trial, order them dismissed, or make such other disposition of them as he sees fit; and no charge will be referred to a court for trial unless it has been found that a thorough and impartial investigation thereof has been made as prescribed herein, that such charge is legally sufficient to allege an offense under this code, and is supported by evidence indicated in the report of investigation.

SEC. 219. Investigation of charges: An investigation of charges shall include inquiries as to the truth of the matter set forth in said charges, form of charges, and what disposition of the case should be made in the interest of justice and discipline. The accused shall be advised of the charges against him and of his right to be represented at such investigation by counsel. Upon his request, he shall be represented by civilian counsel if provided by him, or military counsel of his own selection if such counsel be reasonably available, or by counsel appointed by the appointing authority. At such investigation full opportunity shall be given to the accused to cross-examine witnesses against him if they are available and to present anything he may desire in his own behalf, either in defense or mitigation, and the investigating officer shall examine available witnesses requested by the accused. If the charges are forwarded after such investigation, they shall be accomplished by a statement of the substance of the testimony taken on both sides, and a copy thereof shall be given to the accused.

SEC. 220. Staff judge advocate: Every reviewing authority shall have a staff judge advocate who shall advise the appointing or reviewing authority as to all matters prescribed by this code and shall perform such other duties as may be devolved upon him by law, regulation, or custom of the military, naval, or air services.

SEC. 221. Assistant staff judge advocate: Any assistant staff judge advocate shall be competent to perform any duty devolved by this code or by law, regulations, or the custom of the military, naval, or air services upon the staff judge advocates.

SEC. 222. Action by trial counsel: The trial counsel of the court to which the charges have been referred shall, within 48 hours after receipt thereof, cause to be served upon the accused a copy of the charges upon which trial is to be had. A failure so to serve such charges shall be a ground for a continuance. The trial counsel shall as soon as practicable upon serving the charges upon the accused notify the defense counsel thereof. No trainee shall against his objection be brought to trial before a national security training court within a period of 72 hours subsequent to the service of charges upon him.

SEC. 223. Trial counsel; prosecution: The trial counsel of a national security training court shall prosecute in the name of the United States.

SEC. 224. Oaths: The trial counsel shall administer to the national security training court the following oath or affirmation: "You, , do swear (or affirm) that you will well and truly try and determine, according to the evidence, the matter now before you, and that you will duly administer justice, without partiality, favor, or affection, according to the provisions of the Code of Conduct of the National Security Training Corps, and if any doubt should arise, not explained by the said code, then according to your conscience and the best of your understanding. So help you God?" When the oath or affirmation has been administered to the members of the court, the president of the court shall administer to the trial counsel an oath or affirmation in the following form: "You, , do swear (or affirm) that you will faithfully and impartially perform the duties of a trial counsel?"

All persons who give evidence before the court shall be examined on oath or affirmation administered by the trial counsel in the following form: "You, , swear (or affirm) that the evidence you give in this case shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God?"

In case of affirmation the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted.

SEC. 225. Arraignment, pleas, and motions: The accused shall be arraigned, at which time the charges and specifications shall be read to him by the trial counsel. The accused may plead guilty or not guilty. If the accused makes any irregular pleading, or after a plea of guilty sets up matter inconsistent with the plea, or if it appears that he has entered the plea of guilty improvidently or through lack of understanding of its meaning and effect, or if he fails or refuses to plead, a plea of not guilty shall be entered in the record, and the court shall proceed as though he had pleaded not guilty. Prior to so pleading, or at any other time, the accused may make any pertinent motion which the court shall dispose of as justice may require.

SEC. 226. Challenges: Members of a national security training court may be challenged by the accused or trial counsel for cause stated to the court. A majority of the court shall decide the challenges by secret written ballot but challenged members have no vote. Upon a tie vote the challenge shall be sustained. Each accused and the trial counsel shall be entitled to one peremptory challenge.

SEC. 227. Opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence: The trial counsel, defense counsel, and the national security training court shall have equal opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe. Process issued in national security training court cases to compel witnesses to appear and testify and to compel the production of other evidence shall be similar to that which courts of the United States having criminal jurisdiction may lawfully issue and shall run to any part of the United States, its Territories, and possessions.

SEC. 228. Refusal to appear or testify: (a) Every person not subject to this code who—

(1) has been duly subpenaed to appear as a witness before any national security training court, or before any military or civil officer designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before such court; and

(2) has been duly paid or tendered the fees and mileage of a witness at the rates allowed to witnesses attending the courts of the United States; and

(3) willfully neglects or refuses to appear, or refuses to qualify as a witness or to testify or to produce any evidence which such person may have been legally subpenaed to produce; shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States.

(b) Any person who commits an offense denounced by this article shall be tried on information in a United States district court or in a court of original criminal jurisdiction in any of the Territorial possessions of the United States, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such courts for such purpose. Upon conviction, such persons shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for a period not exceeding 6 months, or both.

(c) It shall be the duty of the United States district attorney or the officer prosecuting for the Government in any such court of original criminal jurisdiction, upon the certification of the facts to him by the national security training court, to file an information against and prosecute any person violating this article.

(d) The fees and mileage of witnesses shall be advanced or paid out of the appropriations for the compensation of witnesses.

SEC. 229. Compulsory self-incrimination prohibited: No witness before a national security training court or before any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before a national security training court or before an officer conducting an investigation, shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any question the answer to which may tend to incriminate him or to answer any question not material to the issue when such answer may tend to degrade him.

No statement obtained from any person in violation of this section or through use of coercion, unlawful influence, or unlawful inducement shall be received in evidence against him in a trial by a national security training court.

SEC. 230. Depositions: Depositions may be taken and used as evidence before national security training courts in the same manner as now or hereafter provided for courts martial.

SEC. 231. Former jeopardy: No trainee shall, without his consent, be tried a second time for the same offense, but no proceedings before a national security training court resulting in a conviction shall be considered a trial until the reviewing authority shall have taken final action upon the case. A proceeding which, subsequent to the introduction of evidence but prior to a finding, is dismissed or terminated by the appointing authority or on motion of the prosecution for failure of available evidence or witnesses without any fault of the accused shall be a trial in the sense of this section.

SEC. 232. Limitations as to time: No person subject to this code shall be liable to be tried and punished by a national security training court for any offense committed more than 1 year before arraignment of such person: Provided, That the period of any absence of the accused from the jurisdiction of the United States, and also any period during which by reason of some manifest impediment the accused shall not have been amenable to military justice, shall be excluded in computing the aforesaid period of limitation: Provided further, That this section shall not have the effect to authorize the trial or punishment for any crime or offense barred by the provisions of existing law.

SEC. 233. Evidence: Insofar as not otherwise prescribed in this code or by regulations promulgated under authority of titles I and II of this act, the rules of evidence for courts martial shall be applied to national security training courts.

SEC. 234. Rulings on legal questions: The law member shall rule in open court upon all interlocutory questions other than challenges arising during the proceedings: Provided, That any such ruling made by the law member upon any interlocutory question other than for a finding of not guilty or the question of accused's sanity, shall be final and shall constitute the ruling of the court; but the law member may at any time consult with the court in closed session before making a ruling, and may change any ruling made at any time during the trial. Unless such ruling be final, if any member objects thereto, the court shall be cleared and closed and the question decided by a majority vote, viva voce, beginning with the junior in rank. A tie vote on a motion for a finding of not guilty or on a motion relating to the question of the accused's sanity shall be a determination against the accused.

SEC. 235. Instructions: Before a vote is taken on the findings, the law member shall, in the presence of the accused and counsel, instruct the court as to the elements of the offense and charge the court—

(1) that the accused must be presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established by legal and competent evidence beyond reasonable doubt;

(2) that in the case being considered, if there is a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, the doubt shall be resolved in favor of the accused and he shall be acquitted;

(3) that if there is a reasonable doubt as to the degree of guilt, the finding must be in a lower degree as to which there is no reasonable doubt; and

(4) that the burden of proof to establish the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt is upon the Government.

SEC. 236. Findings: After both sides have rested and after any argument of counsel, the national security training court shall make its findings as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, which findings it shall announce in open court.

SEC. 237. Findings of guilty: In the event the accused is found guilty, the national security training court shall receive evidence as to the age and service of the accused, together with any evidence of previous convictions by a national security training court or a district court of the United States, the Territories, or possessions or the District of Columbia in accordance with the provisions of section 250 of this code and any other pertinent data submitted by either side, for consideration by the national security training court in fixing the punishment.

SEC. 238. Sentence: The national security training court shall thereupon sentence the accused. The sentence shall be announced in open court.

SEC. 239. Vote on finding and sentences: The findings and sentence shall be determined on secret written ballot by the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

SEC. 240. Policy as to sentence: The national security training court shall adjudge a minimum sentence consistent with the maintenance of discipline and shall, if it believes such action consistent with the foregoing policy, recommend to the reviewing authority that he suspend the execution of the sentence in whole or in part.

SEC. 241. Bad conduct discharge or dishonorable discharge: In the case of a trainee, as defined in this title, a bad conduct discharge or a dishonorable discharge shall be effected only pursuant to a sentence of a national security training court. The court upon proof of two previous convictions by courts deriving jurisdiction under the provisions of this code, or if otherwise satisfied from the evidence that the accused is incorrigible, or as an included punishment for any of the offenses denounced by sections 251 to 258, inclusive, of this code, shall have power to adjudge bad conduct discharge or dishonorable discharge from the National Security Training Corps, in addition to any other punishment authorized by this code. The bad conduct discharge shall be adjudged for an offense or offenses warranting separation under conditions other than honorable as included punishment, but not of nature to warrant dishonorable discharge. The dishonorable discharge shall be adjudged for an offense or offenses warranting dishonorable separation as included punishment. A bad conduct discharge or dishonorable discharge shall not be adjudged unless a complete record of the proceedings and testimony before the court has been made. A bad conduct discharge or dishonorable discharge adjudged in such cases shall be effective only when ordered executed by the reviewing authority, after the record of trial has been held legally sufficient to support the sentence and approved by the Judge Advocate General of the service concerned. The holding of the Judge Advocate General shall be final and conclusive.

SEC. 242. Effect of bad conduct discharge or dishonorable discharge: The execution of a bad conduct discharge or a dishonorable discharge shall forfeit any right to credit by the trainee for time served in training, and shall not prevent the trainee, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Army, Navy, or Air Force, as the case may be, in his discretion, being reinducted for all or part of the training prescribed by law.

SEC. 243. Preparation of record of trial: The trial counsel shall prepare the record of trial, which shall include in narrative or other form the testimony of the witnesses. In such cases as he shall deem appropriate, the appointing authority may detail a reporter to record the proceedings of the trial. The trial counsel and the defense counsel shall agree upon the record and the statement of the testimony, and shall authenticate the record in certification of their agreement, and the record shall thereafter be authenticated by the president of the national security training court. In the event of disagreement, the testimony of the witnesses and any other part of the record in dispute shall be stated by the national security training court, whose decision evidenced by the signature of its president shall be final.

SEC. 244. Disposition of record of trial: The record of trial shall be transmitted to the reviewing authority who shall forthwith refer it to his staff judge advocate for consideration and advice. After having been acted upon by the reviewing authority, the record of each trial by a national security training court shall be transmitted to such headquarters as may be prescribed by the head of the training agency concerned.

SEC. 245. Approval by reviewing authority: No sentence of a national security training court shall be carried into execution until it shall have been approved by the reviewing authority and in the case of a sentence involving a bad conduct discharge or a dishonorable discharge until the record of trial has been held legally sufficient and approved as provided in section 241. However, a sentence involving withholding of privileges, extra duty, restriction, or confinement shall run from the date of the announcement of the sentence by the national security training court. Neither an acquittal nor a finding of not guilty shall require approval by a reviewing authority and neither shall be disapproved.

SEC. 246. Powers incident to power to approve: The power to approve the sentence shall include the power to approve or disapprove a finding and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense and to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence and to order a rehearing: Provided, That no rehearing shall be ordered upon any charge or specification upon which the accused has theretofore been acquitted by the national security training court nor shall such court on rehearing have power to increase the sentence originally imposed. The power to approve a sentence shall include power to mitigate or remit the sentence or suspend, for a period not exceeding the period of training, the execution of a sentence or any part thereof but shall not include the power to increase the sentence. The reviewing authority, or his successor in command, or superior military training authority shall have power to vacate the suspension of any sentence, or any part thereof, and order it carried into execution.

SEC. 247. Confinement of trainees: So far as practicable, trainees held in confinement shall not be confined with members of the Armed Forces.

SEC. 248. Surrender of trainee to civil authorities: Any trainee who is accused of a crime or offense punishable by the laws of the United States or the Territories or possessions, or of the District of Columbia, or of the several States or a subdivision thereof shall be surrendered, upon application duly made, to the civil authorities for trial: Provided, That any proceedings, trial, or period of punishment resulting therefrom shall not operate to relieve the trainee from any liability for further training in the corps.

SEC. 249. Return of trainees held by civil authorities: The commanding officer or superior military training authority, when advised that a trainee is held in custody by the civil authorities shall in appropriate cases make application for his return to training control; the trainee unless already tried by the civil court for the offenses with which he was charged by the civil authorities may be brought to trial before a national security training court, or the case shall otherwise be disposed of, in the discretion of the commanding officer or superior military training authority.

SEC. 250. A Matter of Belt-Tightening

OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Altoona Tribune, entitled "A Matter of Belt-Tightening":

A MATTER OF BELT-TIGHTENING

On Sunday, new income-tax increases went into effect for most of the wage earners of this country. The immediate need for which this new money is to be used is not to be questioned, for it is earmarked for military defense purposes.

However, we should be dull, indeed, if it did not occur to us, as it must to every taxpayer who thinks for a moment about his costly central government, that if the people in Washington had been a little less free with our money in the last few years, and so eased off the pressure of the wartime taxes, most of which we still bear as the new raise hits us, the new tax increase would not bring our total taxation to the record-breaking peak at which it stands today.

We must have money now to build up our defense establishment. But, while Mr. Truman, and Mr. Snyder and Mr. Oscar Ewing, speak of tightening our belts, they obviously mean our belts, the people's, for they say nothing at all about tightening the Government's belt.

It would seem only the part of common sense that if it becomes necessary now to expand our spending vastly to protect our Nation, that this emergency financial strain be offset to some extent by reduction of domestic spending.

Yet, never a word about such cuts from any responsible Government official. Always, belt tightening is for the people. The bureaucrats don't want to cut a thin dime off their expenditures.

Notice how cleverly Mr. Ewing, the Federal Security Administrator and one of the Government's chief propagandists, treats the matter of reduction of domestic spending:

"How strong would our foreign policy be if our country were weak, if our people were hungry, if our workers were dissatisfied, if we had millions of unemployed roaming the streets? How would we stop aggression if our people were diseased and discontented? How far would we get if our factories were idle and our industrial plant stagnating?"

This, of course, is exceedingly smart propaganda aimed at anyone who would advocate any cuts in the proposed administration welfare state program, which includes, incidentally, a plan for national-health insurance for which Mr. Ewing was speaking specifically in his address before the Federation of Labor at Houston some time ago.

Mr. Ewing represents here that any reduction in the proposed social-welfare program would be disastrous to America. And, of course, it would be nothing of the kind. Much of that program for which he was speaking so obviously, fortunately has not even been formally proposed in the Congress.

Mr. Ewing infers that unless the Government programs become law, the country will disintegrate.

He infers that unless the administration gets its way, or unless every New Deal or Fair Deal political proposal of the last decade become, or remain, law, America will dissolve in its own weakness.

At the very least, Mr. Ewing seems to assume that every person unconnected with the Government is weak-minded, with too little American initiative to support the country in the way that made it the greatest nation on earth.

His argument, of course, is utterly ridiculous. It merits no serious consideration. For it is merely propaganda, aimed at deception and distortion of the facts. Mr. Ewing wants no curtailment of spending.

Americans concerned for their country's welfare might well ask when the administration is going to cut nonmilitary spending, when is it going to tighten its belt?

S. 3898, Authorizing Flood Survey of Las Vegas Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of Senate bill 3898, to authorize a preliminary examination and survey for flood control and allied purposes of Las Vegas Wash and its tributaries, Las Vegas, Nev., and vicinity. This bill, introduced by the junior Senator from Nevada on July 11, 1950, passed the Senate on July 26, 1950, and was referred to the House Public Works Committee, where it is now pending.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3898

A bill to authorize a preliminary examination and survey for flood control and allied purposes of Las Vegas Wash and its tributaries, Las Vegas, Nev., and vicinity

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Army is authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey for flood control and allied purposes of Las Vegas Wash and its tributaries, Las Vegas and vicinity, Nev., to be made under direction of the Chief of Engineers, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made for runoff and water-flow retardation and soil-erosion prevention on such drainage area, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes.

The Federal Lobby

OF
HON. HENRY J. LATHAM
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, the Federal departments and agencies are now spending about $250,000,000 a year on Government publicity and propaganda to condition public opinion in favor of administration policies and programs.

These combined activities of the Federal bureaus have been described by Members of this House as our most dangerous lobby. Certainly the Federal lobby is the largest and most powerful with which Congress must contend. If all its costs—hidden and direct—could be tabulated, the bill to the taxpayers would be shown to approach $1,000,000,000 a year. At present we can tabulate only the printing expenses, mailing costs, and some editorial salaries, aggregating something more than $200,000,000 a year. But under prevailing accounting methods there is no way of knowing how much in administrative and executive salaries is diverted largely to publicity and propaganda activities in the one-thousand-eight-hundred-odd-administrative units of the Federal establishment.

THE HOOVER COMMISSION STUDY

On September 22, 1950, I presented for the consideration of the House the voluminous task force report prepared for the Hoover Commission on the subject of Government publicity and propaganda. That report carried the story to September 1948. I now present additional material on the same subject which has come to hand since the Hoover Commission completed its work. Members will recall that under Public Law 162 of the Eightieth Congress, approved July 7, 1947, the Hoover Commission was required to submit its reports and terminate its activities by the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress in January 1949. The new material presented herewith has come to light since that time. It forms, in effect, an addendum to the task force report which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on September 22, 1950, at page A6861.

THE REES SURVEY

The task force report placed the cost of production and distribution of Government intelligence at approximately $100,000,000 a year. Representative E. H. REES, of Kansas, a distinguished member of the House Civil Service Committee, since has conducted an extensive independent investigation in this field, with a view to offering remedial legislation. He estimates the cost of Federal publicity and propaganda to be in excess of $200,000,000 a year—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 21, 1950, page 5525. In debate on the 1951 appropriations bill, Mr. REES said:

> The annual cost of Government printing alone; that is, not including original research, writing, typing, editing, reviewing, and checking, is over $50,000,000. Experience of one large Government agency indicates that editing and preparing copy for the printer costs three times as much as the actual printing. On that basis, the cost of Government publishing would run about $200,000,000 annually. This still excludes the cost of research and writing, on which figures are not available.

Representative JOHN TABER, of New York, then cited a budget estimate of $58,000,000 for Government printing for the fiscal year 1951.

Representative REES expressed the conviction, from his own surveys, that much of the Government material was unnecessary, expensive, and to a great extent wasteful.

TREMENDOUS WASTE DOCUMENTED

The Federal Government operates the biggest printing and publishing business in the world.

Mr. REES continued:

> There is widespread overlapping in federally owned printing plants and facilities, not only among departments, but within cities throughout the country. There are 61 separate Government printing and duplicating plants in Washington; there are 23 in San Francisco, 25 in Philadelphia, 16 in Chicago, 6 in Kansas City, 6 in Denver, 16 in New York, and so on. The Army and Air Force have 140 printing and duplicating plants, the Navy has 87, Commerce Department has 26, and the Interior Department, 15.

In many cases, as we all know so well, large editions of bureau publications are run off the presses at the Government Printing Office. But there is no public demand for many of these books and pamphlets. On this point, Mr. REES reported:

> Tons and tons of undistributed Government publications are sold as waste paper each year, to clear storage space for new publications. In 1947 and 1948 alone, the Government Printing Office condemned more than 10,000,000 copies of publications. How many millions more were condemned by the agencies themselves is not known.
> Investigators for the Senate Appropriations Committee found as many as 500,000 copies of some publications on hand, and 200,000 to 300,000 copies of others. All had lain there for several years, untouched and unwanted, taking up valuable storage space.

In one instance, the Interior Department published a 23-volume series on the Columbia River Basin. The production cost for printing—not including any editorial expense—was $36.06 per set. But when the Department put this series on sale through the Government Printing Office, it was offered at $6.90 per set. Only a few sets moved at this price. Most of the books were given away.

In 1948, the Senate Appropriations Committee requested each department to submit one copy of every publication issued during the fiscal year 1947. Congressman REES checked the results of this survey:

> The committee actually received 83,723 different publications before giving up for lack of room. One bureau was ready to send up a stack of publications, one copy of each, estimated to be 52 feet high. Another bureau would have required seven file cabinets of four drawers each to accommodate one copy of each of its publications for the year.

OFFICIAL PROPAGANDA FOR THE BRANNAN PLAN

Government propaganda for the Brannan plan is a conspicuous current example of Federal lobbying. Systematic mobilization of the Department of Agriculture's field service employees to agitate for the Brannan plan, as one specific and documented instance of Government-financed pressure-group activity, is traced in detail in the 1950 debates of Congress.

On April 3 and 4, 1950, the United States Department of Agriculture's county committeemen of the Production and Marketing Administration in the State of Minnesota, met at St. Paul. The Secretary of Agriculture, Charles F. Brannan, was scheduled to address the meeting on the second day, April 4. Evidently the managers of the program felt that the county committeemen, by themselves, would not make a sufficient audience for the Secretary. On March 16 a notice was sent at Government expense—the taxpayers' expense, if you please—to all 5,000 community committeemen of the Production and Marketing Administration in Minnesota. This notice was signed by Charles W. Stickney, chairman of the Minnesota PMA committeemen. In effect, the notice directed the 5,000 community committeemen to attend the St. Paul meeting at 2:30 p. m., April 4, to hear the Secretary's speech. The invitation from Chairman Stickney carried this language:

> A travel allowance is being authorized for community committeemen who attend this meeting.

In conclusion, the invitation added:

> We feel that this is an opportunity which you, as committeeman, cannot afford to miss. We strongly urge you to attend this meeting.

On June 20, 1950, the Comptroller General of the United States issued a 300-page report on his investigation of the St. Paul political rally. This report listed the Minnesota community committeemen who turned in expense vouchers for the trip to St. Paul. On average, it cost the Department of Agriculture approximately $40 per head to bring these men into St. Paul for the rally. The detailed expense accounts may be examined in the Comptroller General's report at pages 203–206. Yet the Comptroller General found the expenses of the St. Paul meeting justified under a provision of law permitting travel expenditures when necessary to the successful administration of the program.

Here, then, was an unblushing all-expense, tax-paid mobilization of some 5,000 community committeemen to hear the Secretary of Agriculture make a political speech in support of his own conception of socialized agriculture. It may be questioned whether all American history affords a more flagrant abuse of executive authority, or a bolder dipping into Federal appropriations for bureaucratic propaganda activities supporting the official party line of thought or policy.

Such a propaganda mobilization should come as a danger signal to America. As stated by Prof. E. Pendleton Herring, of the department of government in Harvard University, the question is: "Can one speak of government by consent, when this consent is manufactured by official press agents?" When American public opinion is formed and spread from the very top layers of Government down through the grass roots of the States, then the administration frankly has begun to experiment with the mechanisms of official thought control. That was the system perfected by Hitler in Nazi Germany. It was the system which brought down complete disaster upon Tojo's Japan. It is the system which today enslaves millions in darkest Russia. In this instance, the entire operation was at the direct expense of the American taxpayers. The Comptroller General's report computed the cost of the St. Paul meeting at approximately $200,000. This estimate was based on payments of $8 per day to the community committeemen, plus $9 a day for subsistence on duly authorized travel, plus an allowance of 5 cents a mile to those who drove to St. Paul in their own automobiles. All these funds were diverted illegally from moneys appropriated by Congress for soil conservation programs, not for political activities. Throughout the entire upper Mississippi Valley the St. Paul meeting was headlined in press, radio, and television as the opening gun in the 1950 congressional campaign for the Brannan plan.

One Member of the Senate examined the complete transcript of the St. Paul meeting. He reported—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 11, 1950, page 5051:

> About two-thirds of Secretary Brannan's speech was devoted to promoting the Brannan plan, and the rest of it to condemnation of Allan Kline and the American Farm Bureau, who oppose the Brannan plan.
> I have searched diligently through the transcript and can find nowhere that he makes any reference to the subject matter for which the conference of county committeemen was called, namely, the formulating and administration of agricultural programs as authorized by law. * * *
> The speeches of both the Secretary and the junior Senator from Minnesota, Senator HUMPHREY, were political from start to finish. Money appropriated to the Department of Agriculture for soil-conservation programs cannot be legally spent in hiring audiences for political purposes.

Of course, there is no law on the books authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to approve vouchers for such political meetings. But neither is there any record that a question ever was raised by the General Accounting Office touching any of the vouchers turned in for this political rally.

Extended debate touching the St. Paul meeting was held in the Senate on April 11, 1950. The debate developed that county committeemen expressed themselves as feeling under compulsion to attend at Government expense.

Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, cited title 18, section 1913, of the United States Code, which forbids diversion of any Federal appropriation to activities calculated to influence legislation. The St. Paul mobilization of the community committeemen of the PMA, he told the Senate, presented "a clear violation of the law."

To date, however, no action has been taken, either by the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Justice, to discipline or reprimand any of the officials who arranged the St. Paul political rally.

The Comptroller General's report to Congress revealed that the St. Paul meeting was planned, not on a State-wide basis but rather as a regional conference to reach all the State committeemen for the entire upper Mississippi Valley. In addition to the Minnesota employees of the Department of Agriculture, the PMA State committeemen were invited from Iowa, Wisconsin, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Nebraska, and Illinois. The estimated cost of $200,000 for this meeting did not include expenses incurred by officials attending from Washington; neither did it include the cost of advance arrangements, invitations, publicity, and promotional activities, both in Washington and St. Paul.

The St. Paul meeting was discussed in the House of Representatives on April 21, 1950, in connection with the 1951 appropriation bill. In that debate total traveling expenses of all Government departments and agencies for the fiscal year 1951 was given as $356,000,000. Representative KEATING, of New York, said in this debate:

> Of course, we all know what the Department of Agriculture is doing. It is a public scandal and an open violation of the law. They are running all over the country trying to sell the Brannan plan to the farmers and consumers—all at the taxpayers' expense.

Two days earlier, on April 19, 1950, Senator BYRD, of Virginia, reviewed the St. Paul rally for the Senate, concluding on this note:

> It appears to me that the propaganda machinery of the Federal Government has reached a new low when it uses Government funds for the purpose of hearing the Secretary of Agriculture explain the Brannan plan.

THE GOVERNMENT LOBBY FOR SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

On March 30, 1950, the Buchanan committee investigating lobbying activities—House Resolution 298, Eighty-first Congress, first session—devoted the entire day's hearing to the topic, "The Role of Government Agencies in Influencing Legislation." Frank H. Weitzel, Assistant Comptroller General of the United States, was the principal witness. He was questioned about the St. Paul farm rally for the Brannan plan, and also about the European tour by Federal Security Administrator Oscar W. Ewing and a selected staff of FSA assistants, between December 1, 1949, and January 17, 1950.

Press and radio comments on Mr. Ewing's trip characterized it as chiefly a propaganda mission designed to laud on a world stage the advance of socialized medicine in Great Britain.

Chairman BUCHANAN asked the General Accounting Office for a report on this trip. The Comptroller General, in turn, asked Mr. Ewing for a statement. Ewing's statement then was transmitted to Congress verbatim. It explained that the mission was an official survey approved in advance by President Truman. The cost of the junket to the American taxpayers was not computed. In transmitting Ewing's statement to Congress the General Accounting Office added: "There is no information readily available to this office which indicates the facts to be other than as reported."

Thus, the Buchanan committee's investigation of Oscar Ewing's mission was, in fact, limited to a whitewash written by Oscar Ewing himself.

Press conferences were held by Mr. Ewing in London, Dublin, Edinburgh, Stockholm, Rome, and Tel Aviv, plus a final round-up and review conference aboard the La Guardia in New York Harbor on January 17, 1950.

"I come home with even greater confidence in President Truman's proposal for national health insurance in the United States," was the headline theme of the New York press summary.

Whatever the nominal purposes of this expensive and extravagant mission, the record is clear that it provided, at public expense, a world-wide sounding board for avowed advocates of socialized medicine. No argument, proposal, or suggestion challenging socialized medicine appeared in the press and radio summaries of the Ewing junket. When a committee of Congress demanded a report and accounting on the mission, Mr. Ewing himself was permitted to write his own report to the General Accounting Office, denying all charges of propaganda and lobbying, as had been aired so extensively in the press and radio. There the matter was snuffed out, so far as congressional inquiry was concerned.

This incident is arresting for the light it throws on the propaganda techniques of the Federal Security Administration. It warns Congress that more vigorous and effective methods of legislative inquiry may be required in the future to explore Federal lobbying activities, if the General Accounting Office serves no further purpose than to transmit to Congress the official justifications of the suspected or accused agencies of propaganda.

The propaganda machine of the Federal Security Agency is one of the largest and most expensive in the entire Federal establishment. During the last 10 years it has demonstrated several times that it is beyond the reach of real congressional investigation. It is a law unto itself. Yet it is sustained entirely by the Federal Treasury.

Government propaganda and lobbying do not serve the people. They serve only the greedy interest of the power-grasping bureaucrats. They will destroy representative government, if not restrained.

The Consequence of Our Diplomatic Failure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, this Nation with a terrible sacrifice of life and treasure has demonstrated its fighting prowess and has been victorious in two great wars of world magnitude, but due to international influences and the failure of our country's diplomats we are assuming the burden of militarism that will alter if not destroy our form of government.

In order that my colleagues may have an expression of my views on militarism and peacetime conscription, there is inserted herewith a letter recently received from the Washington office of the American Legion, with my reply thereto, and a statement of my views on peacetime military training as announced in 1945:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, D. C., October 7, 1950.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
United States Congressman, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On June 19, 1945, in testimony on proposed universal military training legislation before the Select Committee on Postwar Military Training Policy in the House of Representatives, your organization indicated opposition to passage of such legislation at that time. In the light of recent developments the American Legion is anxious to learn whether or not your organization has changed its position with reference to universal military training.

We would greatly appreciate a brief statement setting forth your present attitude toward universal military training. In the event we do not receive an answer from your organization we will assume that your position remains unchanged from that expressed in your testimony of June 19, 1945, before the Committee on Postwar Military Policy.

Hoping that we will receive your kind cooperation in this matter and thanking you in advance for your courtesy, I remain

Sincerely,

GEORGE J. KELLY,
Assistant Director, National Public Relations Commission.

OCTOBER 14, 1950.

Mr. GEORGE J. KELLY,
Assistant Director, National Public Relations Commission, the American Legion, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KELLY: Answering the inquiry made in your letter of October 7, concerning my position on universal military training, there is enclosed for your files and information a copy of my remarks extended in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 16, 1945. Since that time my views have not much changed on this important subject.

It is my feeling that if our Government had exercised a little diplomacy in dealing with its allies at the close of the war and had seen to it that Russia was given the right of navigation to warm water ports through the Dardenelles and protected in the use of that right by the establishment of a commission to control the Dardenelles, and permitted Russia to participate in the acquisition and utilization of petroleum in the immense oil fields recently discovered in the Near East, which is practically in Russia's back yard, there would be a very different situation in world affairs at this time.

It would seem that your great organization, the American Legion, which has experienced the rigors of war, would give its attention to bringing about universal disarmament and the establishment of permanent peace, rather than devote its tremendous influence to assist in building up military powers throughout the world armed to the teeth. You will find in my statement which is enclosed reference to the experience of France and Germany in building up armaments and in military training, which brough them nothing but despair and destruction.

I for one propose to devote my efforts to securing universal disarmament and the establishment of permanent peace throughout the world.

It is my suggestion that when the members of the American Legion have occasion to sing carols at Christmas time—Peace on Earth Good Will Toward Men, they will mean what they say.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

(Remarks of Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, of Idaho, in the House of Representatives, Tuesday, October 16, 1945)

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, of the many issues under the consideration of our Government and the Congress, the proposal to establish universal peacetime military training is a serious threat to the freedom of the American people and our form of government.

Starting from a small beginning, surrounded on every side by potential enemies with a foothold in this country, in Canada on the north, in Louisiana Territory on the west, and in Florida on the south, the plan that provided an army and navy for our defense and protection in those perilous times and which was given us by the founders of this country, has made this Nation preeminent among world powers. Now, after winning the war which extended to every quarter of the globe, with all but our allied nations defeated and helpless for generations to come, we are told we must sacrifice the best years of the education of our youth to adopt the same plan of compulsory military training which was followed by the heretofore strongest military powers in Europe—Germany and France—a plan that saved neither country in the holocaust of war which has just swept over the world.

In this conflict we fought for peace and justice. Now that we have peace let us direct our efforts to achieving amity and fair dealings among all the people of the earth and establishment of a just and enduring peace. The principles of the issue of peacetime military training we are called upon to deal with are ably presented in the following article by Joy E. Morgan, editor, Journal of the National Education Association, to which I fully subscribe:

"To the EDITOR OF THE STAR:

"Lowell Mellett's comparison in the Star of peacetime conscription with required attendance at school, calls for further consideration. He has performed a service in his admirable column by bringing this issue into the open. Let us make a comparison.

"First, take required attendance at school. It applies to young children, not to men at 18 or over who are face to face with getting established in life. School attendance does not take the child out of his home, away from his parents, and away from his community and local church. The school requirement does not insist that the child attend any particular school—he may go to a Catholic school or a Lutheran school or any kind of private school which meets reasonable standards. Whatever school he attends is in charge of persons responsible to the community. Education is guided growth. It does not seek to force the child, but in cooperation with the home and local church and neighborhood to build his natural endowment into the finest possible well-rounded character. The common free school, more than any other institution is close to the people, responsible and responsive to their wishes, and devoted to the ideals of the golden rule and the brotherhood of man.

"HIS VIEW OF CONSCRIPTION

"Second, take conscription. It proposes to go into every home, community, church, and school and by force to take from those homes and communities their mature young men, to put them under military law, in charge of officers not selected by the community and not responsible to it. It proposes to put these young men in charge of an Army hierarchy whose whole outlook, training, experience, and faith are associated with the use of force and the conviction that force and only force can maintain peace. It is proposed to give these young men a training in the art of killing, which, in many cases will destroy the very finest elements of their manhood. It proposes to give them training in 'citizenship,' Army style, which by its very nature is totalitarian and medieval. Every young man is to be exposed to a life which as anyone familiar with such life knows multiplies drinking, gambling, and prostitution.

"In a nutshell the fundamental difference between educational philosophy and military philosophy is this: Education asks, What is right? What is best? and allows wide freedom. The military asks, Who's boss? and Who's strongest? One builds democracy, the other destroys it and always will. The day the United States adopts conscription, if it should do so, which I do not believe it will, would mark the beginning of the end of American democracy and would be a black day in the life of humanity everywhere. Conscription would be a constant threat to our personal rights, political liberties, and representative institutions.

"SEES NO NEED TO HURRY

"This is not a matter that needs to be decided hurriedly. We can afford to wait until the shape of things to come is clearer; until the United Nations Organization is in operation and we can know our obligations under it; until a sincere effort can be made under Representative MARTIN'S bill for a world conference on the limitation of armaments; until plans can be evolved for whatever peacetime program is needed in a form that will not destroy our democracy and produce riots and rebellion, and until the issues can be thoroughly discussed and considered in at least one congressional election.

"Nothing could be more foolish than to try to rush this issue through Congress before Christmas to avoid the next election. The issue should go over into the next congressional election and it will go over unless its proponents drop it. Even the passage of conscription by Congress would not prevent that, but would merely make certain that the question would be an issue in every congressional election until it was repealed. Members of Congress know this. They know that the people will hold them accountable and will not forget. The people will not forget because they will be reminded year after year as families are broken up, men taken from farm, office, store, and community when most needed. They will be reminded when their sons who wish to go to college and prepare for the professions are delayed in their careers. The people will not stand for conscription in the form in which the Army hierarchy is trying to ram it down their throats by methods which reveal all too well how much respect many Army men have for the democratic processes. We are all proud of the part our Army leaders have played in winning the war; we shall have to look to civilians to win the peace.

"Each Day the Radio From Moscow Pours Forth Its Venom—People All Over the World Are Being Told To Hate the United States and Everything for Which It Stands—We Cannot Relax—Every One of Us Must Realize That Everything We Hold Dear and Sacred Is in Jeopardy"—Dr. John R. Steelman

OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I need not tell you all that South Korea has now been liberated. The capital city of Seoul, with battle embers still burning, has within the last few hours fallen into the hands of the forces of the United Nations, led by General MacArthur.

It takes no word of mine to tell you all that freedom is not free. The fight that the brave American boys, together with their allies, have made in behalf of Korea did not fail to collect its toll in death and injury. Thousands have already paid the supreme sacrifice for the liberation of that country from the dreaded forces of the Communist atheists, imperialistically inspired; and still the fight is not yet won.

The shooting war in Korea has now raged for more than 100 days and nights, and no man can prudently forecast its end. The interest in that war, although thousands of miles removed, supersedes all other interests of the people in these United States.

Inasmuch as the assistant secretary to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman, has for some time been heading up a series of telecasts entitled "Battle Report—Washington," telling of that conflict, I am again directing these and the talks of other public officials whom he is presenting in this week's program to your attention.

Through this telecast, Americans everywhere are able to appraise the successes on the home as well as on the diplomatic fronts not alone in Korea but throughout the world.

It is in the knowledge that this series of teledocumentaries have proven of inestimable value and interest to our people everywhere that I am again directing this, the eighth Battle Report—Washington to the attention of my colleagues in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have been given to understand that already, as a result of the splendid teledocumetary of the National Broadcasting Co., innumerable requests have been received by the Department of State from high-school teachers, college and university professors, librarians, and others throughout the country, asking more complete information pertinent to the teledocumentaries being cast by Dr. John Steelman and the representatives previously introduced by him to the video audience of the National Broadcasting Co.

Mr. Speaker, on this occasion Dr. Steelman presents the distinguished Secretary of the Department of the Army, Mr. Frank Pace, as well as the Deputy Chief of Staff of the United States Army itself. They will tell us of the work being done by the Armed Forces in the current battle for freedom. Additionally thereto, he is going to bring us on a visit with three great Americans who are now heading up the transportation service of the Nation.

Commissioner Knudson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, will tell of rail and truck transportation; Admiral Cochran, Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board, will tell us of the work being done by the American ships carrying men and merchandise to the four corners of the world; Mr. Delos W. Rentzell, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, will detail just how United States civil aviation is serving mankind in its peaceful endeavors.

To quote but a few words of Dr. Steelman:

> We still have another opportunity to meet with the Under Secretary of State, Mr. James E. Webb, who, in telling of the activities on the diplomatic front, will point out how, slowly but surely, we are making progress toward building a better world of peace.

Mr. Speaker, it is only in part because of the foregoing that I am asking the unanimous consent of this House to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD Battle Report—Washington telecast over the National Broadcasting Co. on October 1, 1950.

The telecast was as follows:

ROBERT MCCORMICK. As the burning capital city of Seoul is returned to the Republic of Korea, as the liberating UN forces raise a flag of freedom to fly once more above its streets, NBC again points its cameras upon our own Capitol to bring you your eighth Battle Report, Washington.

Washington, separated by thousands of miles of continent and ocean from the men meeting the challenge of communism head on, but vital source of the increasing strength that is spelling their victory.

In this fifteenth and most heartening week of the war, standing by to report to you where we are, where we've been, and where we go from here, are top Washington officials who've lived with the war since it first exploded over the rice paddies of Korea. Our cameras choose first the assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

DR. STEELMAN. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. The events of the past week have been encouraging to free people all over the world. However, we must remember that our military success in Korea does not mean that the battle for freedom has been won. Each day the radio from Moscow pours forth its venom. People all over the world are being told to hate the United States and everything for which it stands. We cannot relax. Every one of us must realize that everything we hold dear and sacred is in jeopardy. The only way we can save our way of life is through our own strength in cooperation with our friends of other nations.

This afternoon we have reports from three fronts—the military, the diplomatic, and the domestic. First, we will hear from the distinguished Secretary of the Army, Mr. Frank Pace. Then the Deputy Chief of Staff of the United States Army will tell us of the vital role our Army plays in the battle for freedom.

On the domestic front three prominent Government officials will tell us how the transportation problem is being solved. Transportation, as you well know, is vital not only to the military but to our entire domestic economy. These three men are directing our defense transportation efforts. Commissioner James K. Knudson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, will tell us about rail and truck transportation. Admiral E. L. Cochrane, Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board, will tell us how American ships are carrying both men and merchandise to the four corners of the world. Mr. Delos W. Rentzell, the new chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, will tell us how aviation is serving mankind in peaceful ways.

Again this afternoon we have another opportunity to meet with the Under Secretary of State, Mr. James E. Webb. He will tell us about the activities on the diplomatic front, and how slowly but surely we are making progress toward building a world of peace.

MR. MCCORMICK. Today word reaches us that before the sweeping march of UN troops, all organized enemy resistance has virtually ceased in South Korea. What is left of the shattered Red Army has retreated hell-bent behind the doubtful safety of the thirty-eighth parallel where the Allied drive is now halted. Nowhere below that line is the enemy attempting a real stand. And as a fitting climax to all that has gone before, Friday General MacArthur returned the liberated city of Seoul to the grateful Republic of Korea. But there is much unfinished business still on the agenda. To describe what is yet on the books, and to give us a more complete insight on what the Army faced when the Korean conflict erupted—including some hitherto little-known facts—our cameras bring you next the Secretary of the Army, Frank Pace.

FRANK PACE, JR. This afternoon I know I voice the sentiment of a grateful nation when I acknowledged the debt we owe the gallant men who have brought the United Nations campaign against aggression in Korea so close to final victory. We also owe a debt to their families, many of whom have made sacrifices far beyond anything that will be asked of the rest of us in the days ahead.

As we survey the developments of the past three momentous months, there are several things which stand out crystal-clear: one is the swift and unmistakable determination of the American people to help stop aggression wherever and whenever it breaks out. The speed and decisiveness with which the United States along with the other free nations of the world, responded to the challenge in Korea is the hope of peace-seeking people everywhere. It is a warning—it is the world's most powerful deterrent to any new adventures by the forces of aggression.

The willingness of the American people to make whatever sacrifice is required of them so soon after World War II is reassuring to us as a nation and to the world at large, so desperately seeking a way of collective action for peace.

Today we are pouring billions into our defense forces; training camps are being reopened; hundreds of thousands of American youth are being called to the colors; food, clothing, weapons, supplies are being procured in staggering amounts, paid for by us, the American people, who are determined to resist with all our resources, if need be, those who would destroy us.

And I think the last 3 months have given us another demonstration of the excellent caliber of our military personnel, our officers, and our men. We know that in their hands our national security will have the kind of leadership and support that a democracy should expect. The brilliant delaying action in the first 40 days of Korea is a military performance unsurpassed in history. Sometimes out-manned 20 to 1, those holding forces held to the last round, to buy the all-important time to permit us to place effective fighting forces into action. What they suffered and endured is now paying off in victory. The magnificent campaign in Korea, the shoulder-to-shoulder teamwork of the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marines, along with the other forces of the United Nations, have written a new chapter in the military annals of freedom.

The military conflict in Korea is being settled, but it is imperative that we keep in mind the world-wide situation. At any time, at any place, Communist-inspired aggression may break out again. We must stand guard, ready to execute our responsibilities in Europe, the Far East, and throughout the world.

We are maintaining now the largest peacetime military establishment we have ever had. We in the Army are engaged in vigorous, training programs which General Ridgway will tell you about; we are developing new weapons, improving old ones. Our research in every scientific field continues day and night. The Army, from top to bottom, is vigilant. As pleased and as proud as we are with the Korean victory, the Army is looking ahead. We are not seeking trouble, but we are preparing to help carry out our country's determination to meet aggression wherever it threatens us.

I can assure you this afternoon that your Army is aware of its great responsibilities. It is working diligently and intelligently to help maintain the peace of the world, for you and your family—and for all of us.

MR. MCCORMICK. New names in the news—cities in the north of South Korea rather than the area around Pusan—names like Sibyon, Vijongbu, Wonju—these mark the new advance of our forces—forces hardened for battle by the vigorous training program that preceded their struggle in Korea. Closely concerned with the pre-combat training given our troops is the man who led the Eighty-second Airborne Division in the historical role it played in the North African and Italian campaigns, and himself parachuted with the leading elements of his division into Normandy. The role he plays today—Deputy Chief of Staff for Administration, United States Army. His name—Matthew B. Ridgway. For an inside appraisal of our training program, we turn our camera sights now upon Lieutenant General Ridgway.

General RIDGWAY. This period of our history is critical—critical, not just for days or months—critical not as we have been accustomed to view crises—as situations, however acute, to which by sudden emotional upsurges we can rise, and by sudden bursts of extraordinary energy, surmount. This is not that sort of crisis.

It is not one, which as in the days of our youth as a nation we might confidently expect to conquer, and then to go our way of peaceful living.

It is one of vital import to all living Americans and to their descendants for generations to come, and to every man and woman of every race and creed in whose hearts the love of freedom lives. It is one which may long continue, presenting us through the years, as it presents us in this moment, with problems of decision of as basic and far-reaching a nature as any a free society has yet confronted.

We face great present perils. Yet in the uncertain duration of this period and in our inherent impatience, lies, I think, America's greatest peril of all—the deadly danger that changing tactics may obscure the implacable intent of the Kremlin to attain its unchanging objectives—the destruction of our potential capacity for frustrating its design for world domination.

We should thank God that realization of this has come to most of our leaders, and that it is daily coming to increasing numbers of our people.

We do not know how long we shall be compelled to live as Soviet enemy No. 1, marked for attack by war or subversion at times of his choosing.

We do know now—Korea ripped one mask aside—that there will be no quick and easy solution, no short-cut to our objective.

In our growing national maturity, we begin to see true things at true values; to perceive that the moral transcends the physical by at least three to one.

So it is in every phase of the building of our great and growing Army, and its sister services on sea and in the air.

We need superior numbers and types of weapons as we never needed them before. We can't have them and unlimited luxuries, too. We must choose between differing values.

We need men and women in our ranks. We cannot have them, and an undisturbed economy, too. We must make that choice through the years ahead.

We must have training superior to any we have had before. We shall not have it unless the sterner things of the spirit are placed above the pleasant life; unless hours are longer, efforts are greater, and hazards are accepted in the training of our youths.

In no army on earth are men as well clothed, fed, and paid; as cared for when sick and injured, as in ours. In no other are they better trained and led. We would not have such training, were the moral not recognized as dominating the physical.

As old as man himself is the fear of the unknown, as devastating as fear itself is the sudden surprise appearance of threats the individual never foresaw, and against which in those first moments of mental paralysis he thinks himself defenseless. For every one of such threats in the past, it is entirely possible there will be several in the future. To all of the age-old hazards of battle, science now adds new ones, with increased potentialities for terrorizing the ill-trained fighter, or for paralyzing his mind and hand until it is too late to avert disaster. New forms of old weapons of increased range and destructiveness, new weapons of mass destruction, radiological, biological, and other forms of attack—all new to him—will place him in jeopardy as he has never before been placed.

We seek in our Army training to forestall these evils; to strengthen his spirit as we toughen his body; to teach his leaders to look ahead to the spiritual as well as to the physical dangers which threaten the men they lead, and by precept, example, and ample practice to reduce these dangers to the minimum.

It takes time to accomplish this training; time, and the understanding cooperation of parents and people to the purpose we pursue. It requires a maturity of grasp by the American people of the problem presented, and of the manner by which an unsurpassed corps of officers and noncommissioned officers loyal to every American principle is striving to solve that problem.

The hearts of these men will be no stouter, their courage no greater than the spirit of those who bred and reared them. They cannot alone discharge responsibilities which are equally theirs and those of civilian leadership in every community in everyday life.

They know, as they hope you know, some elemental facts; that weapon superiority will be a vital factor, but that the issue will still rest not with the weapon alone, however marvelous the science of its development and the technique of its manufacture, but with the use made of it by the indomitable heart and unflinching courage of the fighters, in whose virile hands it rests, and in the unfailing support they receive from home.

They see, as they pray you see, that only so can we hope to attain the goal for which we fight—an honorable lasting peace.

Mr. McCORMICK. For every soldier in battle in Korea 5 to 12 tons of equipment had to be moved in. To put men and material where they will do the most good those concerned with the transport of our Nation forged a bridge of trucks, trains, and ships stretching from every war-productive community in the United States clear across the Pacific. Three of the men whose work lay unseen but felt behind the gigantic buildup that permitted us to launch our recent offensive, are now ready to report to you—the people. First the man in charge of our civil air power—which literally "rose" to meet the emergency in the early critical days of the war. He is Delos W. Rentzel, presently chief of the Civil Aeronautics Administration, but this week to become Chairman of our Civil Aeronautics Board—Mr. Rentzel.

DELOS W. RENTZEL. As I speak, somewhere along the borders of the United States the Civil Aeronautics Administration is transmitting the flight plan of a friendly aircraft to the Armed Forces so that it can be identified when it shows up on a radar screen.

This form of cooperation in air defense of the United States is only one of many ways in which civil aviation helps keep the Nation prepared.

Our airlines helped rush men and materials to Korea when the need was most critical, moving about 75 tons a day to the Far East in August.

Our non-air-line aviation groups, who spray and dust crops, patrol pipelines, train pilots, and repair aircraft, have surveyed their resources and have come up with a comprehensive plan for using America's civil air power in the interests of defense.

The Civil Aeronautics Administration network of air navigation aids, traffic control, and communications has been and is being steadily improved with the most advanced electronic devices, to make it increasingly useful as a common system for civil and military use.

Our aircraft manufacturers are stepping up the tempo of production, to keep the United States foremost in the air. Instead of the two-billion-dollar-aircraft program scheduled before the Korean attack, their sights are now set at seven billion.

America's 500,000 civil pilots, her 90,000 civil aircraft, her 300,000 aircraft builders, her 6,400 civil airports—all are prepared for any service the Nation may require of them.

Never forget that 7,000 miles of ocean separate the United States of America from Korea. To tell us something of the tasks involved in meeting that challenge, here is Vice Adm. E. L. Cochrane, Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board and Administrator of the Maritime Administration.

Vice Adm. EDWARD L. COCHRANE. Indispensable as our railroads, highways, and airlines are when it comes to moving men overseas by the thousands and materials by the tens of thousands of tons, sturdy ships moving on the sea lanes of the world are still indispensable. Behind the GI's and the fighting marines in Korea was a fleet of merchant ships carrying the bullets and the beef which these young Americans and their allies needed for their terrific fight and in their advance to Seoul.

The ships used in the Korean campaign were largely Victories hastily broken out of the laidup fleet and operated by the shipping companies under Navy orders. We put over 130 of these vessels into service as well as some transports and other special types. Additional Victory-type cargo ships are being repaired now so that they will be ready for service if needed.

Upon the request of the Secretary of Defense we are undertaking to complete as troopships four of the six big passenger liners now building. This includes the superliner at Newport News which in her new guise will carry more than 12,000 armed passengers in uniform instead of happy civilians on pleasure bent the service for which she was originally ordered and to which we hope she can soon return.

One very important fact, however, is that by far the greater number of the remaining ships in the laidup fleet are famous 10-knot Liberty ships of the emergency program of World War II. Indispensable as these ships were in the last war they are not good enough to carry vital supplies through the advance areas of another emergency. We need ships which can make at least 20 knots to assure the support of our own men and of our allies with speed and assurance in another emergency.

On Wednesday of this week I asked the shipowners and ship designers to deliver to us in about a month the basic plans of such a vessel. We must be ready to move critical cargoes fast and with security. The new type can do the job.

Mr. McCORMICK. Behind the intricate web of railways, highways, inland waterways and port facilities vital to the defense mobilization of our Nation, is the Interstate Commerce Commission. Here now is Commissioner James K. Knudson, recently appointed to administer our defense transportation.

JAMES K. KNUDSON. My responsibilities in the mobilization effort lie in the field of domestic transportation by railroad, streets and highways, inland waterways, warehousing, storage, and port utilization. Problems may develop in all of these fields and an organization, keeping in mind the taxpayers' best interest, will be set up to cope with them.

A defense-mobilization program of the magnitude now under way will require the transporting of large numbers of persons, great quantities of material, and the proper storage and handling of the Nation's wares in port areas and elsewhere. Heavy demands upon the systems that serve these interests will give rise to programs designed to effectuate your Government's careful planning, but also to preserve the rights of the citizens and maintain our American ideals.

As the national defense program unfolds, shortages and dislocations of equipment, materials, facilities, and manpower are bound to occur. Such shortages will require self-imposed conservation measures by carriers and shippers alike. Some Government controls have already become necessary in the field. Others will no doubt follow.

Our two major problems at the moment have to do with the immediate construction of from 150 to 200,000 new rail freight cars and with the maintenance of a stabilized manpower situation in the transportation community. We are not unmindful of other areas of need, particularly in the field of local transit.

The institution of any controls requires a measure of belt tightenirg on the part of all of us and a great deal of hard work by your public servants who must have your support in doing the job as you would want it done and in realizing our common aims of peace and liberty.

Mr. MCCORMICK. As the tide turns at last in the Far East, as the victory for which the Nation has prayed is finally in sight, millions of Americans are already breathing sighs of relief—but all too prematurely—for while the dramatic turn of events is cause for rejoicing, it is also pregnant with new dangers looming on the horizon—dangers that confront us all. To sketch these dangers for you, to prepare us for what we may yet expect, we next greet one of our top Federal officials—a man who has known war both on the front lines and far behind the front, doing an equally important job. Ladies and gentlemen, an ex-marine, now your Under Secretary of State—James Webb.

JAMES E. WEBB. I want to talk to you today about the job ahead.

You will remember that when President Truman spoke to the Nation on July 19, he said:

"There are three things we need to do:

"First," said the President, "we need to send more men, equipment and supplies to General MacArthur.

"Second, in view of the world situation, we need to build up our own Army, Navy, and Air Force over and above what is needed in Korea.

"Third, we need to speed up our work with other countries in strengthening our common defenses."

When the President spoke to you on that July evening, hardly more than 10 weeks ago, the immediate prospect was dark and filled with danger. Our men in Korea were fighting with desperate courage, under a United Nations flag to hold a United Nations beachhead.

Tonight, we can say with deep thankfulness that the end of the United Nations police action in Korea—the successful end—is in sight. We can say that the first of the three things we need to do is almost done.

Looking back, it might seem that the victory has been won with remarkable speed and with surprising ease. That conclusion would be wrong. The real burden, the cruel burden, has been borne by our men in Korea. For them the ordeal has been long and hard. To them our deep thankfulness goes in full measure. Now, let's look ahead. And in looking ahead, let's be very clear about what we have to do and why we have to do it.

What we have to do, what we are already doing, is to build up our military strength with all possible speed. At the same time we are working with other countries to build up the collective strength of the free world. And that, too, must be done with all possible speed.

To accomplish these things is not going to be easy. It is not going to be cheap. Every single American is going to feel the effects of this effort in his personal life. Every single American is going to contribute to this effort. That's the way we do things in our democracy. And because the burden and the sacrifice are shared equally and willingly, we will come through this effort stronger and more united. Experience has shown that this is true.

When we come to the why of the matter, I think most Americans have a pretty clear understanding of the danger we face. That danger is not some time off in the future. It is now.

President Truman put his finger on it when he said, "The fact that Communist forces have invaded Korea is a warning that there may be similar acts of aggression in other parts of the world." The free nations must be on their guard, more than ever before, against this kind of sneak attack.

Our purpose, and let's keep this always in mind, is to prevent another sneak attack, like the one in Korea. And the way to do that is to build up such a strong collective defense that Communist leaders will know beyond all doubt, that aggression does not pay.

But we are not thinking only in terms of military defense. We have other and perhaps even stronger resources on which to draw. One of them is the United Nations. In the case of Korea, we saw the United Nations work as it was really intended to work. As Secretary Acheson has repeatedly said, we are determined that from now on it shall have every chance to go on carrying out the purposes of the Charter.

In addition, the free world has great economic resources to help people fight poverty and to strengthen their faith in the free way of life.

And finally, we have the resources of freedom itself. Let's never forget that freedom is the strongest force in the whole world. We have it in our hands. Our greatest hope and desire is to share it with all our fellow men.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Thus the Nation, America—as leading Washington officials have come before you to report—moves into another week of war in Korea.

And now we urge you to lend eyes and ears to Dr. Steelman and Under Secretary Webb who have an especially important announcement for you at the receiving end of this battle report.

Dr. STEELMAN. This is a book prepared and just released at the suggestion of President Truman. It is entitled "Our Foreign Policy" and contains a wealth of information on the origins, problems, and goals of that policy. Without doubt, it is the most important publication of its kind since the Korean conflict. Under Secretary Webb has made it possible for you to secure this book at no cost—will you tell them about it, Jim.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, John. To secure your copy of Our Foreign Policy, simply address the Office of Public Affairs, Department of State, Washington, D. C. While there is no charge, as Dr. Steelman pointed out, the supply is unfortunately limited. Again, simply write—a penny postcard will do—the Office of Public Affairs, Department of State, Washington, D. C. We, of the State Department, are happy to make this important report available to you, and hope every thoughtful American will read it.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another teledocumentary, this, then, against the background of battle-front Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your eighth Battle Report, Washington.

Acheson Campaign To Oust MacArthur

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a United Press news dispatch which appeared in the Ely Times of September 19, 1950, relative to the Secretary of State's campaign to oust MacArthur.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD EVENTS

(By the United Press)

WASHINGTON.—Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, believes Dean Acheson will be dropped as Secretary of State within 60 days and that Gen. Douglas MacArthur may be ousted as United States commander in the Far East.

In a radio interview MALONE said agitation against Acheson will not die down despite Gen. George C. Marshall's appointment to succeed Louis Johnson as Secretary of Defense. Because of continued public criticism, he said, Acheson, too, will be out.

He said a State Department clique is out to get MacArthur and predicted that its behind-the-scenes propaganda will be stepped up against the Supreme Allied Commander. He added that Mr. Truman would not dare oust MacArthur now because of public opinion.

Address by Dr. Harold W. Dodds, President of Princeton University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the address by Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of Princeton University, delivered at the opening exercises of Princeton University's two hundred and fifth year in the Princeton University Chapel, Sunday, September 17, 1950:

With these exercises Princeton embarks on her two hundred and fifth year devoted to the advancement of knowledge and the education of young men. There is no need to expatiate upon the stresses and strains under which we begin a new academic season. We are truly living in the age of anxiety. Geologists may call it the cenozoic era; but "phenobarbital era" describes it better from a sociological standpoint.

Therefore it seems appropriate on this opening day for me to interrupt my usual habit of talking about matters pertaining peculiarly to Princeton and her educational philosophy, and to give you instead, as briefly as I can, my view of today's world, in which every American, young and old, educated or ignorant, is involved.

Beneath the Nation's strain and anxiety lies an uneasy national conscience. By specific words and actions the United States Government has accepted the responsibility of world leadership in building the United Nations into an effective international government. Yet, the diplomacy of the mightiest and richest people on earth has not been able to prevent resort to war. Whether it can prevent explosion of present hostilities into global war only the future can say.

Yet our collective national mind has been wobbly, uncertain, and divided. Too often the baser features of practical politics, revealed in unsavory maneuvers for personal and party advantage, have tainted the treatment of the gravest issues. Our prestige as a nation, fit to be trusted with the function of world leadership, has diminished since 1945. While paying lip service to the need for military strength, we have seen that strength decline, experts tell us, to a point on June 25, last, substantially under that on Pearl Harbor Day. The total military strength of all the free nations is below that of Russia's, as was made clear last month in the figures announced in Parliament and in the British and French memoranda to our Government.

Our military deterioration has naturally weakened our diplomatic officers in their dealings with an adversary which considers our military weakness but an index of spiritual flabbiness. We have been unfair to our diplomats, for we have compelled them to lead from military weakness rather than from military strength. Neither have their hands included the ace card of an intellectually united and spiritually harmonious America, at a time when our personal and material comforts have been increasing at a most extraordinary rate.

Walter Lippmann's phrase "deficit diplomacy" aptly describes the way in which American commitments abroad increased while our power to meet them declined. Last January, Mr. Acheson defined our "defensive perimeter" in the Far East. Whether or not he excluded Korea is open to argument, but in any case he included more territory than we are militarily able to defend at the moment. Mr. Truman's recent announcement of intention to increase substantially our forces in western Europe merely reminds us of the patent fact that in the last analysis Europe is the critical area in respect to world war or peace.

In the last few years we have heard a great deal about one world. Yet, as thoughtful observers have pointed out, the grim fact is that in several respects we are further from one world than we were in 1914, at the outbreak of World War I. In those old complacent days one could travel throughout two hemispheres without a passport. (My first visit to Europe was possible only by working my way over on a cattle boat. So limited were my resources that had I had to pay the costs of a passport and various visas necessary today, the trip would have been beyond my means.) Then trade, as well as travel was far less restricted; international monetary exchange was freer; intercourse between peoples was easier and friendlier; both commerce and culture were more cosmopolitan than they are today. International intercourse today is between governments rather than between individuals with the consequence that, whether you define war in terms of cold or hot, the restricted intercourse we enjoy today is more warlike than at the opening of the century.

On the other hand, however, it is not all on the grim side; there are some new assets which must be stressed as indications of progress toward world order. In favor of world order today must be listed the credit item of a functioning, if embryonic, world organization, the United Nations. Power imperialism, as western nations used to practice it, has almost passed from the scene. Today more consideration is being given to backward peoples by the more advanced. A greater popular awareness of the horror and stupidity of war has grown up. There is a wide realization (although it is yet far from general) that only new and extreme measures will maintain peace and that there can be peace only with justice. There are grounds to hope that if global hostilities can be postponed for a period, a world order sufficient to meet the requirements of a durable peace can be established.

Now, where does all this leave us? The only way I can answer is to review what I have been preaching for several years. From this point my remarks will be somewhat personal, I fear.

As the end of hostilities approached in 1945, I became increasingly alarmed by a growing expectation that somehow victory would bring automatically a durable peace through the easily and quick organization of a comprehensive world government, which could be established and made to function overnight. In several addresses throughout the country in the interests of a just and durable peace, I pointed out that the basic elements of common consent, of common legal and political experience and habits of thought, which are the foundation of domestic law and popular government within a nation, were still lacking in international relations. As yet, international law is not full-fledged law—it is still in a process of becoming—not merely for the reason that it lacks an international police power to enforce it, but more truly because there does not yet exist among the leading nations of the world the common basis of peaceful habits, popular acquiescence and accepted custom at the international level which underlie the domestic law that we obey without question. Take the Russians, for example. They have had no experience with such democratic practices as free elections or the impartial, judicial settlement of private disputes. Yet, it is these very institutions of democracy, arrived at by years of struggle in our own history, that we correctly consider to be the only rational and enduring basis of a peaceful world order. Therefore, was it to be expected that, no matter how proficient in science and technology, politically backward peoples, unacquainted with the familiar democratic processes of free elections and the judicial settlement of private disputes, would be willing suddenly to entrust their national security to an agent so new and strange as the United Nations? Rather, was it not to be expected that they would naturally adhere to a system they understood, viz, the familiar methods of force, at least for as long as their aims were being successfully attained by force?

But there is more to Russia's behavior than political inexperience with free, representative institutions. Something new has been added to old-fashioned power politics. International communism is a new style in national aggression. Now we are coming to understand that the Communist manifesto meant what it said, and that the gospel of communism is a ruthlessly expansionist doctrine of both domestic and foreign violence—physical, intellectual, and spiritual. Now, after many lessons, although not until international communism under Russia's domination had gained control over one-third of the population of the world, we are piercing the smoke screen of its false social philosophy and perverted ideals of social justice to an understanding of its evil driving power when once it has captured the minds of men.

For these and other reasons, there were, at the end of the war, convincing grounds to anticipate that, as a practical matter, for an interim period at least, the basic deterrent to war would be found in some form of an international balance of power, in which balance Russia and the United States would appear as the chief elements. The unpleasant truth was that, if there was to be peace long enough to enable the United Nations to grow into an effective world government, it would be with the help of balance of power. We who argued thus were not popular among our brethren in educational circles. We were charged with militarism, jingoism, treason to the United Nations, and similar crimes and misdemeanors. Nothing was further from my mind and heart. I want to emphasize that never for a moment did I suggest that balance of power would keep the peace indefinitely. Balance of power has never been a durable agency of peace; its best and only possible service would be as a block on war—long enough for the nations to develop an effective world organization to replace war. I did feel that if America played her part a balance could be achieved which could keep the peace long enough to permit the United Nations to develop into an effective international government.

I have to admit that I underestimated the strength of Russia's resistance to a functioning United Nations, although I cannot but feel that a more courageous military and diplomatic position on our part in the early stages would have influenced her toward more peaceful ways. I realized that the time which balance of power would give for this purpose would be relatively short, but it could be long enough, if the world powers, which alone can support great armaments, were imaginative and zealous for enduring peace. I knew that this line of reasoning placed upon America, as the strongest and therefore the most responsible nation in the world, a rugged twofold task, viz, to maintain a strong military position with a willingness to fight for our way of life if need be, yet at the same time to work incessantly, day and night, for world government as a substitute for war. I realized that these were most difficult—almost contradictory—courses for any nation or any individual to pursue at one and the same time. If we plumped for force alone we were lost; yet, if we neglected force we were equally lost. Military strength alone would not be enough. Balance of power alone could not only result in war eventually, as it always has. But it alone could give us hope of a breathing space sufficient to the development of a wholehearted acceptance and implementation of the ideal of world law under world government.

It is at last clear that there is no present alternative to a substantial strengthening of our military position as the only possible road to peace in the fevered state of the world today. You young people may accuse me, who am past the age for military service, of cold-blooded willingness to sacrifice you to a course of action in which your lives must bear the brunt of disruption and perhaps danger. But, I repeat, I can find no alternative to a larger mobilization of our military resources, although as I shall indicate in a moment, it alone is not enough. I do not venture to suggest what degree of military mobilization will be necessary; no one can now say, least of all an amateur like myself. Later developments will point the way; but from my study in 1947 as a member of the Commission on Universal Military Training, I believe that the President's estimate of approximately 3,000,000 in the Armed Forces is a minimum. Basic to every other consideration (let us never forget) is a full degree of unity and willingness to sacrifice on the part of the millions who will not be called to serve in the Military Establishment proper. I repeat, we must lead from the harmonious combination of military, economic, and spiritual strength; we cannot influence the course of events by being weak in the face of hostile forces that despise weakness.

Despite all I have said, to conclude that another world war is inevitable is rank defeatism. There are reasons to hope that Russia has overextended her front—that she has bitten off more than she can chew; that behind her iron curtain lurk grave internal weaknesses; that she knows that her economy cannot support a war and that the mass of her people are psychologically against it. There is reason to believe that the oligarchy that rules Russia is vulnerable to a campaign of psychological warfare; that behind the iron curtain the dictatorship is less securely entrenched with the masses than we think; which suggests the importance of a more alert compaign of understanding than the feeble efforts undertaken so far. Nor can her rulers be so ignorant and stupid as not to be aware of the overwhelming industrial potential of the United States and the role it would play in global war. There is reason to hope that we can contain Russia, that we can still buy more time, if we are willing now to pay the price in terms of disruption for a period of those pleasant pursuits appropriate to a world at peace.

Let us never forget that power alone will not insure peace; it can only buy us time to develop the foundations of peace. Therefore, what we do now with the time we may buy is all important. If we fail to link to our power a bold and comprehensive program for achieving the peaceful settlement of grave international differences, we shall be committed to an armament race that can have but one ending, disaster. That disaster will be the greater because we shall descend into it with all the bitterness and self-recrimination of a guilty conscience. Policies more fundamental than have heretofore been advanced must be put forward, not as vague ideals to be adopted at some unnamed future date, but as goals to be achieved soon. It is not time for homeopathic doses. The disease just won't wear itself out.

After long consideration I have joined that school of thought which holds that there is no durable solution short of the mutual and complete disarmament of the nations now comprising the United Nations, and that the time to announce our support of it, as the ultimate solution, is now. I stress the words "mutual" and "complete." I place no trust in unilateral disarmament. Moreover, it must be under an accepted world government empowered to administer the process of disarmament, for efforts heretofore to civilize war or to attain peace by international treaties have always failed. Such methods as Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907, the Naval Disarmament Agreement engineered by Charles E. Hughes in 1921, and the Kellogg Pact of 1928 have long since demonstrated their inadequacy. I, therefore, stress the existing organization of the United Nations as the only agency available for undertaking the task in time. I suggest, therefore, that the United Nations turn its attention to the rapid accomplishment of complete disarmament, not merely to the abolition of A-bombs and H-bombs. (May I parenthetically observe that I am here expressing the general philosophy which is most cogently argued in a little book by Grenville Clark, entitled "A Plan for Peace," to be published soon and which I commend to you.)

Realism suggests that the process of universal disarmament must necessarily progress by degrees, beginning with the elimination of the newest and most devastating weapons. The real point is that the accepted goal must be complete disarmament and that, while we are improving our military position to meet the present crisis, America should throw her influence behind disarmament and assert her readiness to lead.

I know that many sincere public officials who have endured prolonged frustration in nerve-wracking negotiations with Russia will reply that, since our good intentions have failed in lesser efforts, they cannot succeed in a more revolutionary and comprehensive program. I agree that our intention to support a broad program of disarmament should not retard for a moment the rapid restoration by the Western World of a favorable power position. But while we are improving our power position as a negative restraint on violence, why should we not also be developing a new positive weapon in the form of a great purpose?

If you object that the proposal that universal and complete disarmament is too bizarre to merit consideration by responsible statesmen, I shall reply in the words of George Washington: "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and just can repair; the rest is in the hands of God."

One thing is clear. The peoples of the world do not want war. Increasingly aware, as they are, of the human costs of another one, are there not grounds for hoping that before it is too late they can be aroused to demand a lasting solution? And isn't it better to work and fight in behalf of a permanent solution than a temporary palliative? One thing we can be sure of: that to fight and win a war, no matter how just the cause or complete the victory, brings no enduring peace. To contain Russia is wise and necessary, but alone it lacks the driving force of a profound ideal which carries the promise of the future we all desire. Heretofore, the bold stroke which would arouse the spirit of peoples by penetrating to the deep heart of our fears and dangers has been absent. To reduce the possibility of war Mr. Baruch has wisely urged that America declare her peace terms now. I should go further by including in such terms the extreme proposal of general disarmament as the chief function of the United Nations.

As a practical matter, a national decision by a strong America in favor of disarmament under world government would be good psychological warfare right now. In terms of the vision by which men and nations live or die, such a stand would cleanse our national conscience and renew our awareness of the mission which our strength lays upon us.

Finally, a special word to Princeton students regarding the academic years ahead. The university authorities can be relied upon to keep you informed promptly of developments and programs at Washington affecting your future here. Special agencies have been established for this purpose. Amidst the confusion and rumors that are bound to develop, we shall do our utmost to keep you abreast of matters affecting you; and to advise individuals as to the course they should pursue.

If and as it may become necessary, the university will adjust to your changing needs. We shall retain, however, our faith in the timeless importance of the education for which we stand. For never has the world stood in greater need of liberally educated people, leaders who see beyond the facts and figures of technology and commerce to the nature and aspirations of human beings.

Remember—what you have heard before—that it is men that the world is afraid of, not the forces of nature. It is not atomic energy we fear; it is how men may use that energy. Early man stood in fear and awe of the forces of nature; the tempest, the lightning, storm, and drought. Science has enabled us to conquer our fear of these; but we have acquired in the process a more devastating fear of each other. Princeton has held for more than 200 years to the belief that a well-rounded education provides the elements by which fears of each other can be exercised and human energies released for greater things.

Until you are summoned to other duties, you can continue your course here with a clean conscience if you earnestly pursue your education. It will help equip you to meet later the Nation's, and the world's, greatest problems. Let us keep the coming year as normal as circumstances permit, in certain confidence in the values of the education we believe in. Let us all pull together in the Princeton tradition. With God's help we can and will make it a good year.

I extend to each and every one of you my personal best wishes for a fruitful life on this campus.

I have not pulled any punches. I have frankly given you the pattern of the facts as I see them. Anything less would be eyewash, and an insult to your intelligence. But above all else, do not become cynical and do not fall into despair. The very tensions we are under; our national awareness of danger, exceeding our grasp before World War II, are sound reasons for hope.

British Jet Arouses Questions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD two news dispatches from the New York Times for Tuesday, September 12, and Thursday, September 14, concerning the questions aroused by the British jet.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of September 12, 1950]

BRITISH JET STIRS QUERIES ON SOVIET—EXPERTS THINK RUSSIANS MAY HAVE BUILT SIMILAR PLANE WITH ENGINES LONDON SENT

LONDON, September 11.—Aviation experts took a long look at Britain's fastest interceptor plane in the world today and said the Soviet Union might have developed one almost as fast from jet engines shipped to Moscow by the Labor government.

The controversy over 50 jet aircraft engines supplied to the Soviet Union 4 years ago came to a head after Britain displayed a powerful twin-engined fighter powered by her most powerful jets at the Farnborough Air Show.

The fighter was a standard Royal Air Force Meteor. The engines were the new Sapphires, billed here as the world's most potent jets—with a single Sapphire developing as much power as all four piston engines in a United States Superfortress. The plane was flown in public for the first time last week.

ROLLS ROYCE ENGINES SENT SOVIET

The engines sent to the Soviet Union were Rolls Royce "Nene" and "Derwent" type jets, a Ministry of Supply official said.

The Sapphires, taken off the secret list only a few weeks ago, were developed largely from information gained flying the Nene and Derwent engines.

"If I didn't know a single thing about jets, and someone gave me 50 to play around with, I'd have a mighty fast plane flying in a very few years," one British expert said.

The Soviet Union, with the aid of expert German engineers taken here after World War II and known to be working on jet development outside Moscow, could have carried out similar experiments, design specialists said.

At least the British engines probably shoved the Soviet Union as much as 10 years ahead in her development of jet aviation.

FIRST SOVIET JET FLOWN IN 1945

That would be quite a jump for a nation that flew its first jet over Berlin near the war's end. The Russian jet flown in the Battle of Berlin was a patched-together model of a captured German Messerschmitt, western experts believe.

Reliable sources said the decision to send the engines to the Soviet Union, despite substantial objection on the part of British military circles, had been approved on very high level by the Labor government.

The Sapphire could drive a plant at 1,000 miles an hour—if an airframe could be built to stand the stress—experts estimate.

The Meteor, even without a fuselage designed for high subsonic or supersonic flying, approaches the speed of sound with only one of its two Sapphires turned on, reliable sources said.

It reaches 40,000 feet in under 3 minutes.

[From the New York Times of September 14, 1950]

BRITISH HALT EXIT OF JET AIRCRAFT—BAN ON SCARCE WAR MATERIALS COVERS LANDS NOT IN ATLANTIC PACT OR COMMONWEALTH

LONDON, September 13.—Britain has ordered a halt to deliveries of scarce military equipment, including jet aircraft, to countries outside the North Atlantic Pact and the British Commonwealth.

This action had been foreshadowed yesterday by Prime Minister Attlee in the House of Commons.

However, as the Government has not yet promised unequivocally to withhold machine tools from the Soviet Union and its satellites, the Conservative Party moved in Parliament tonight to block such exports.

Winston Churchill and other Conservatives offered a motion in the House of Commons urging the Government "to suspend the export of heavy machine tools and strategic raw materials that would add to the war potential of possible aggressors, or which we or our allies require for our own defense."

That motion will be debated Monday. Meanwhile an undertaking in almost the same terms came from the Government in the House today.

Hugh Gaitskell, Minister of State for Economic Affairs, said that Mr. Attlee had made it perfectly clear that the Government would stop the export of items of equipment, including machine tools required by Britain and her allies. Requisitioning powers would be used if necessary, Mr. Gaitskell added.

ATTLEE PLEDGE RECALLED

He did not say that equipment not needed here would be withheld, although it might be useful, as Mr. Churchill has alleged, for the war industries of Communist countries.

In the House yesterday Mr. Attlee said that action had been, or would be, taken to insure the availability of goods needed for the war effort of Britain and her allies.

On the day before the Government of Egypt, which has been receiving considerable deliveries of British arms and equipment, including jet fighters, was informed of the new British policy. Other governments that have placed arms contracts here, including Argentina, are likewise being informed.

This does not mean that all arms deliveries to countries outside the great alliance necessarily will be halted.

The ban applies only to high priority items—presumably of the type that the North Atlantic Council of Deputies have urged the Atlantic pact countries to produce at the greatest possible rate.

The Ministry of Supply accordingly has been instructed to ask British concerns manufacturing for foreign buyers to postpone deliveries of high priority items indefinitely.

Such items, it would appear, are to be produced only for Britain, her North Atlantic allies, and the Commonwealth countries.

OUTCOME OF SECRET TALKS

OTTAWA, September 13.—Britain's decision to halt the supply of high priority arms to all countries outside the Commonwealth and the North Atlantic Pact group was disclosed here today to be the outcome of a secret North Atlantic Pact conference held recently in Paris.

At this meeting representatives of Canada and the United States called on European members, including Britain, to tighten up against shipment of strategic materials to Communist countries by reclassifying strategic lists to match those used in North America.

Statement of James Dillon, Irish Minister of Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, by request, an extract from the remarks of Mr. James Dillon, the Irish Minister of Agriculture, which were made at a meeting organized by the Ancient Order of Hibernians at Glenties, County Donegal, Ireland.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Referring to communism, Mr. Dillon remarked that at the present time no honest man or woman could remain neutral. To pretend neutrality was, in reality, to help the Communists and the sooner that fact was faced and personal decisions were taken in the light of it, the better it would be. The Minister then made this observation: "Would that Ireland had the opportunity of taking her decision on this issue as a united nation. Why cannot those who maintain the crime of partition not see the wicked folly of it before it is too late?"

Mr. Dillon stated that the attack on Korea by the Cominform was the first stage of a conspiracy to destroy freedom and Christian faith all over the world. If America had not been there to challenge that aggression, it would have spread like a prairie fire throughout the whole Orient and by now the Philippines, Formosa, Indochina, Burma, and Malay would have been overrun. This would have led to the destruction of India and Persia, and Europe would have been faced with the choice of becoming the world's battleground or of capitulating. "All this," he said, "had been averted by the heroic resistance of a handful of American soldiers who for the last month had held a heavily equipped army of 250,000 Communists at bay."

Not the Way To Conserve Ores

OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Reno Evening Gazette of September 8, 1950, relative to the development of the mining industry.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT THE WAY TO CONSERVE ORES

Closing down American metal mines to conserve the reserves of strategic ores is a fallacious theory held by some of the planners in Washington. They would leave the ore in the ground, and meanwhile import metals from foreign sources as long as possible.

This is another case where the theorists talk about things of which they have no practical knowledge. Mines aren't underground storage vaults, Federal treasure hoards of gold at Fort Knox and silver at West Point.

Closed mines must be maintained, and this is an expensive process. Extracting the ore and reducing it to metal cannot be done on a moment's notice, either. It takes complicated and costly equipment to operate a mine and mill, and skilled personnel. At a time when these vital minerals would be needed, there would be a shortage of both men and equipment.

Rather than regard the ore deposits of this country as a supply that can be tapped easily, the Government planners should be concerned with developing new sources to assure an adequate supply for both war and industrial purposes. In two world wars, this country found itself short of many metals. Only when the situation became critical did the Government show any interest, and then it spent money extravagantly in an effort to develop the domestic mines. But as soon as peace returned, the lessons of this short-sighted policy were forgotten, and the efforts of the mining industry to get Federal aid to bolster up the industry were dismissed, and the mining men were accused of trying to claim an undeserved subsidy.

Resolutions on Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD three resolutions adopted by the American Federation of Teachers at their national convention held on August 21–25, 1950, in Detroit, Mich.

There being no objection, the resolutions were printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISCRIMINATION IN INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION

Whereas segregation and discrimination against citizens of the United States because of race or color is practiced in transportation, under laws of several of the States of the United States; and

Whereas such segregation and discrimination has been shown by recent judicial decisions to be contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, as far as interstate transportation is concerned; and

Whereas such judicial interpretation, however beneficial it may be in its ultimate effect, is not being implemented by officials of the United States and the several said States with sufficient rapidity under present laws: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Federation of Teachers in convention assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States be petitioned to pass laws preventing segregation and discrimination against citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or national origin, in interstate transportation of all kinds.

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL FOR NATION'S CAPITAL

Whereas rights granted to American citizens by the Constitution of the United States are daily violated in the Capital of the Nation; and

Whereas the exclusion of Negro citizens from theaters, moving-picture houses, restaurants, hotels, and other places for amusement, entertainment, and education in the Capital of our Nation has made us appear backward to the rest of the civilized world; and

Whereas such a situation has been and will continue to be exploited by the potential enemies of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Federation of Teachers in convention assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States be respectfully petitioned to pass a civil-rights bill for the District of Columbia resembling civil-rights laws that are now on the statute books of several States of the United States.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE LAW

Whereas there is a prospect of increasing unemployment in our country; and

Whereas such unemployment is likely to be suffered in unusual degree by members of minority racial and religious groups; and

Whereas action by the several States is not likely to be taken in time adequately to deal with this problem; and

Whereas it is highly desirable that the National Government set an example to our country as a whole: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Federation of Teachers in convention assembled, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned to enact a fair employment practice law for the States and Territories of the United States, including the District of Columbia.

Peacetime Battle

OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the July 1950 issue of the Mining Congress Journal, entitled "Peacetime Battle," which has to do with the mining industry in the United States.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACETIME BATTLE

"Battles are only a sort of public verification of mastery gained during peace," said William James, famed naval historian. As this is written, American fighting men are carrying out United Nations punitive sanctions in Korea. There is risk that this procedure might result in a war that would again engulf the major portion of the world. Since, however, the initiative does not rest with the United Nations nor the United States, none of our professional or amateur prognosticators are doing anything more than making educated guesses.

This activity is a healthy one; every enemy capability should be thoroughly considered in enabling this Nation to seek the right course. Unfortunately for us, there are some most unpleasant facts that must be faced in laying plans for the part we will play when and if the opposition decides to quit heckling and move out in force. No matter where the enemy may strike or in what force, we must be prepared to answer with the measures most likely to result in our victory; delivery to the enemy in quantity of raw materials in fabricated and injurious form. This requires an abundant supply of minerals, the product of a healthy, vigorous mining industry.

Tonnages of those metals essential to the prosecution of a war can only come from a live industry such as could exist in the climate created by adoption of the tax recommendations made by the National Minerals Advisory Council and the American Mining Congress. But a dismal picture is drawn when one examines the results of a recent survey made through the members of a society that embraces most of those technicians who make the decisions as to whether exploration or development of new metal deposits is economically justifiable.

This study, which also inquired into corrective measures, was conducted to determine the relative extent of new development and exploration being carried on today as compared with 1940, and the relative health of the various branches of the industry at both ends of the decade.

The examination revealed that exploration and development in the coal industry had not changed materially, but the general opinion held was that labor troubles and taxes had placed the industry in a far less favorable condition than in 1940.

Since 1940 exploration and development of new iron-ore reserves has increased by 50 percent, but the widespread thought encountered was that, in event of war, the industry would not be in as good shape to produce as it was 10 years ago.

Figures concerning exploration and development for the nonferrous metals indicate a reduction of 74 percent. The consensus of opinion was that, should an emergency arise, the industry would be badly off in comparison to the condition prevailing in 1940.

These figures, together with the considered opinion of the experts, glaringly reveal that but little effort is being made to find new ore reserves. At the same time, many mining companies maintain high production from ore deposits developed with prewar dollars and at prewar costs. This ore is being turned into 1950 depreciated dollars. If an endeavor was made to replace those reserves under present costs and subject to current taxes, it would be almost impossible to show a profit commensurate with the risk.

When we examine into the number of operating underground mines, we find that, in California, the total had declined by 76 percent from 1940 to 1949 and that mining employment has fallen off by 72.3 percent in this last decade. In Utah the number of shipping mines has dropped 89 percent in the same period; Oregon has undergone a 95 percent decline in underground lode mining and Nevada has suffered a 62.7 percent reduction. Although final data are not available on the number of mines producing strategic metals, in the period 1940–49, lode mines producing either copper, lead, zinc, gold, or silver, declined in New Mexico, 53 percent; in Arizona, 67 percent; in Montana, 59 percent; and in Colorado, 43 percent.

What do these figures mean to us? When we weigh them against the exceptionally high World War II submarine sinkings of shiploads of critical materials, and consider the superior underseas fleet that opposes us today—there is food for thought. Domestic mining undergoes a steady downtrend in the face of foreign imports. New reserves are not being found at an adequate rate. Know-how is being lost as important strategic metal mines are forced to cease operations. Have we lost our peacetime battle? It appears most unlikely that we would be able to achieve, as quickly as needed, the output of minerals and metals to sustain a major effort.

This condition would be understandable if it had been brought about by natural exhaustion. Such is not the case. On a course closely duplicating the errors made in the post-World War I era plus a few new and untried mistakes, lack of sound and constructive Government policies has brought the domestic mining industry to its present precarious situation.

Included among the harmful factors are the dead hand of a Federal tax structure that permits insufficient return to justify the risk involved; inadequate depletion allowances and a tariff system too weak to encourage competition with foreign imports.

World events focus attention upon mineral supply. To enable the mining industry to fulfill current requirements and to meet the demands of another emergency, the recommendations of the NMAC and the AMC should be adopted immediately. It is not yet too late to take this step to assure this Nation's continued peacetime mastery.

Chickens Home To Roost

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the October 11, 1950, issue of the New York Times in connection with the McCarran anti-Communist bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICKENS HOME TO ROOST

Of the many silly features of Senator MCCARRAN'S masterpiece, the Internal Security Act of 1950, the immigration provisions are among the silliest. Anyone who had taken the trouble to study them before passage of the law would have foreseen the absurd situations which would inevitably result from this ill-disguised effort to erect an iron curtain around the shores of the United States. In analyzing the bill last August 18, we noted that "it moves our immigration procedures in precisely the wrong direction * * * and could keep out of the United States people of the very type that all of us (except perhaps Mr. MCCARRAN) want to admit." The trouble is that most Members of Congress apparently did not bother to consider the drastic nature of these (or any other) sections of the McCarran Act, but allowed themselves to be swept along in the general tide of frightened approval of anything that could be called anti-Communist.

Under the broad and vague terms of the McCarran law, anyone who at any time has ever been affiliated with the Communist or other totalitarian party of any foreign state is automatically excluded, subject only to the right of the Attorney General to grant temporary admission and to make a detailed report to Congress in each case in which he so acts. Thus Friedrich Gulda, a 20-year-old Austrian pianist, who, at the age of 10, joined the Hitler youth movement because he had to, was barred from entry until the Attorney General granted him leave to remain here for 6 days. Thus Fedora Barbieri, a young Italian mezzo-soprano who 10 years ago attended a school in Italy which was, as one might suppose, run by the Fascists, was barred from admission yesterday. Thus any singer who ever sang under the Nazis must be barred because in order to sing they all automatically had to join one or another Nazi organization. Obviously the problem of admitting formerly active Nazi, Fascist, or Communist artists raises quite another question. Here we are talking about artists of no political background, who are excluded solely because of perfunctory membership in one of the innumerable affiliates of the totalitarian regimes.

At the moment, attention is focused on the artists whom the McCarran Act prevents from contaminating American audiences. But, damaging as this policy will be to our artistic life, the problem is of even deeper significance. Many intellectual and political leaders who have long since renounced communism or any other antidemocratic philosophy are, especially in western Europe, in the forefront of the struggle to keep the world free. As reaffirmed in the McCarran Act, our policy is to turn thumbs down on them, to say there is no hope of redemption and thereby to alienate men and women who could be among our most effective friends. Our policy, in short, simply does not make sense. Perhaps when Congress reconvenes after the election the law will be modified in conformity with the real interests of a free and democratic United States.

Tariff Cuts Offset by Use of Import Quotas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a news dispatch which appeared in the Wall Street Journal of September 27, 1950, relative to the Torquay, England, conference where 39 nations, including the United States, will enter a bout of tariff cutting.

The United States concessions, through tariff- and import-fee reductions, will be without regard to the differential of the cost of production due to the difference in the wage standard of living between this Nation and the competitive countries, and will further remove the floor under wages and investments.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROBLEM AT TORQUAY: EFFORTS TO SPUR TRADE BY TARIFF CUTS ARE OFFSET BY USE OF IMPORT QUOTAS

(By Warren H. Phillips)

TORQUAY, ENGLAND.—Thirty-nine countries will start a winter-long bout of tariff cutting here tomorrow in the interest of freer world trade—but some of them have slipped aces up their sleeves to keep their own industries from getting hurt.

Delegates from nations carrying on four-fifths of the world's trade have assembled at this one-time smugglers' nest on England's south coast—a "free trading" center of a past century. The negotiations are expected to be on an even larger scale than the two previous postwar rounds of tariff cutting at Geneva, in 1947, and at Annecy, France, last year. The American Government emphasized the importance it attaches to the conference by sending Willard Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State, as head of its delegation. It is the first time a person of his rank has lead the United States group.

UNITED STATES CUTS IMPORT DUTIES

The State Department already has announced it may cut import duties on about 2,500 products, including many that might stir American producers. Among these items are wool, fish, clocks, wines, whisky, paper, textiles, toys, chinaware, rayon, and dairy products.

Yet some other countries figure on having their cake and eating it at the same time. They'll agree to lower their tariff barriers in return for American concessions that will enable their exporters to sell more in the States. But while ready to throw off some trade shackles, they've been forging a few new ones to protect their home industries.

Here's how this double-dealing works:

Since the war, the number of countries applying quantitative import restrictions has swelled until all but 9 out of 85 nations now require import licenses or foreign exchange permits. Governments imposed these quotas and other import barriers with the idea of keeping their people from buying whatever they wanted in the United States and in other countries with whom the particular nation had balance-of-payments difficulties; in other words, to keep purchases in the dollar area, for example, from far outdistancing the number of greenbacks the country could earn by selling its own exports there. Without such restrictions, it is claimed the monetary reserves of many countries would have been rapidly drained dry after the war.

PROTECTING DOMESTIC INDUSTRY

At the same time, however, these import restrictions had the incidental effect of protecting domestic industries from foreign competition. And now trade experts here agree that many countries no longer needing these import curbs to protect their monetary reserves are retaining them chiefly as a protective device for their home industries—to nullify to a large extent the effects of tariff reduction.

One top American delegate gives a hypothetical example: "A factory may not be taking care of as much of the home demand for a particular product as it might if there were less foreign competition," he says. "So quantitative import restrictions are imposed with the idea of cutting down this foreign competition. The reason given is that this helps the balance-of-payments difficulties. It's difficult to decide where you are going to start and stop in applying them."

RELUCTANT TO GIVE UP "Q. R.'S"

Some import barriers erected to protect dwindling postwar monetary reserves afforded absolute protection to certain home industries—foreign products were banned. Now some producer groups and labor groups in these industries are reluctant to give up their sheltered life and face foreign competition. In some cases, it is believed the restrictions have probably influenced the direction of investment; new auto or fishing-tackle production capacity, for example, might have developed where there would not have been a big enough market to justify it if foreign imports had been allowed. These many groups have a vested interest in the maintenance of the quantitative restrictions—called "Q. R.'s" in the economists' jargon—and they're pressuring their governments to keep them.

The general agreement on tariffs and trade, under which the Torquay negotiations are being held, sanctions quantitative restrictions only if imposed to rescue a country from depletion of monetary reserves. The trend toward "Q. R.'s", which will be discussed at Torquay, was reviewed several months ago by a working party appointed by the countries which have signed the general agreement on tariffs and trade. In an 18-page technical report issued this summer, the group flatly declared:

"Some of the restrictions have remained in force after the need for them has passed away, and of the Q. R.'s applied for financial reasons, many have been retained to protect domestic producers against foreign competition."

Delegates here are reluctant to make specific allegations of bad faith against any particular country. "All sorts of other things definitely creep into the picture besides payments troubles," says an American official, "but it's ticklish to argue with a country about what the prime purpose of its Q. R.'s are and which of the effects are incidental."

Nevertheless, the delegates do agree that abuse of these import curbs and their use as a protective device is becoming widespread. "There definitely is a strong and perhaps unavoidable tendency to retain Q. R.'s even after the balance-of-payments troubles have eased," acknowledges an official of the tariff conference's secretariat.

OTHER WAYS TO GAIN ADVANTAGE

Delegates here also agree that some countries are finding other ways to stifle world trade for the sake of their home industries at the same time they are participating in projects such as this one to get it back to normal.

Western Germany, for instance, will be the most important new participant in the Torquay talks. The United States hasn't discussed tariffs with the Germans since 1930. There are a number of important United States imports from Germany on which duties may be cut, including steel specialties, chemicals, toys, optical instruments, and machinery. Most of these categories weren't discussed at the previous two tariff conferences because Germany was a chief supplier and wasn't represented at them.

GERMANY MODERNIZES OLD CODES

But the new West German Government has just modernized its old tariff code and revaluated its duties. Trade experts say it's impossible to get an accurate statistical comparison of the new list and the old, but those who have examined the modernized list in detail agree that the rewriting job represents an over-all upward revision.

"This way they'll come to Torquay with something more in their pockets to bargain with," says one official.

Once a country signs the general agreement on tariffs and trade, it is bound not to raise its over-all tariff level. Western Germany is not the only country that made sure to hike its rates just before signing on the dotted line. France reevaluated its tariffs before it joined the Geneva talks in 1947, and Italy did the same before entering the tariff negotiations for the first time last year at Annecy. The general impression among the specialists is that, on an over-all basis, both were upward revisions.

One effect of these reevaluations is to give these countries a bargaining advantage in the tariff negotiations. They can ask tariff cuts from other countries and reduce their own duties proportionately—yet their home industries would not feel the full effect of the reductions when they are compared with the tariff level before the code was rewritten.

REEVALUATION OFFSETS

The reevaluations have yet another effect. France and Italy held their new duties in abeyance until the recent trade liberalization drive in western Europe—in which the Marshall plan nations have already agreed to free 60 percent of the trade among themselves from quantitative import restrictions. Then they put their modernized tariff schedules into effect.

Thus while trade is freed by one method, such as reducing Q. R.'s, these reductions are in some cases met by tariff increases which throttle commerce. These reductions in quantitative restrictions apply only to western European nations. American exporters won't find it any easier to sell abroad than previously. And when tariffs are cut here at Torquay on a basis that will make the cuts applicable to all 39 nations taking part in the talks, some of the effect will be nullified by maintenance of Q. R.'s by some countries for protective purposes.

The upshot is that in protecting home industries, Europeans have found there are many ways to skin a cat—none of them conducive to free trade and a return to normal international commerce.

Communism and High Prices Are Our Most Serious Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, to my mind the most serious problems that confront us today are the many problems that arise because of the wide infiltration of Communists and their activities into our country, and the next most serious are the mounting prices of all commodities. I shall discuss each of these subjects briefly.

The reason for there being so much communistic activity in our country dates back to the recognition of Russia as a nation by President Roosevelt. President Wilson had refused to recognize Russia and so had Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. One of the first new things done by the New Deal was to take Russia into full fellowship with the United States. That same spirit of giving America away at every opportunity has characterized the New Deal from that time down to now.

By reason of this spirit of laxity on the part of the New Deal we soon found that our immigration laws were being violated on every hand and undesirables by the thousands were finding their way into our country.

Under Madam Perkins, our Secretary of Labor, and many others who shared her views, we soon found many foreigners holding responsible positions in our Government. We also found the Communists in our country becoming more active and more assertive until they were secretly dominating some of our Government departments and activities. They seemed to gravitate most naturally into the State Department and into the Department of Labor. Evidently they got more sympathy and more freedom in these two departments. They became so powerful that we soon found them sitting at the elbow of President Roosevelt at many of the most important international conferences ever held by any officers representing our country. Alger Hiss was Roosevelt's most confidential adviser and if he had not been convicted as a perjurer he would no doubt be Secretary of State now.

Mr. Speaker, the communistic activities of hundreds of these Government employees should have been known to Roosevelt and his crowd. The fact that Roosevelt and his crowd did their utmost to prevent an exposure of these traitors throws the burden of proof upon them.

When Mr. Truman said in 1948, "I like Old Joe—he is a decent fellow," he surely was terribly ignorant of historical facts or he was being flippant as he was when he criticized that great branch of our national defenders known as the United States Marines.

Mr. Speaker, a reasonable amount of political partisanship can be tolerated even from a President. Fair partisanship between political parties is a stimulant just as fair competition is a stimulant to business. But blind stubborn partisanship which fails to be incensed at unpatriotic conduct is carrying partisanship too far.

When the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives was bringing out into the open the facts of the Whittaker Chambers case and the Hiss case and many others, it was improper for President Truman to refer to these activities as a red herring. If he had the patriotic sportsmanship that characterizes the usual American he would have acknowledged his mistakes. He has not done so. As the score now stands Truman still thinks that "Old Joe" is a fine fellow and that Alger Hiss and thousands of other traitors are free Americans and that the Marines are not what we all have claimed for them.

Mr. Speaker, the national situation is too precarious to admit of the injection of politics into our economic activities. The Korean war and the serious threat of war in other directions should cause those in authority to appreciate their responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be able to say to my constituents and to the world that from my first election to Congress I have been in the front line in opposition to the bringing into our country of undesirable aliens and in favor of deporting all those who favor communism and who agitate against our Government. I am the author of legislation that restricted immigration and restricted the action of suspicious aliens.

Mr. Speaker, the only way this dirty mess can be cleaned out is to elect a Republican Congress and Senate on November 7 and elect a Republican President in 1952.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the other important issue of high prices. I confess that this is also a serious problem and a difficult one to work out. The unwise meddling with the ordinary and natural business methods by the Roosevelt administration brought about many maladjustments that proved difficult to remedy. We will not forget NIRA and WPA, and many others. We will especially remember OPA with its attendant black markets and high-handed business practices. We will remember that it was as a result of the disclosures of the Republican Food Study Committee of which I had the honor of being chairman that President Truman did away with the OPA and although the people are terribly displeased with the present conditions from which such tremendously high prices have come upon us, nobody that I know of wishes a return of OPA.

Mr. Speaker, Congress in the present session passed a law giving tremendous powers to the President over our business activities and especially over prices of food and living commodities. He was also given the power to control the wages that naturally are a part of the price of practically every commodity.

The President will probably take no action with reference to this urgent problem until after the coming election. He should not play politics with serious matters. Action should be taken immediately for the situation is serious and getting more serious every day. It is unfortunate that all these economic loads and maladjustments fall heaviest on the persons who are least able to carry them.

Mr. Speaker, just a short time ago, Mr. Albert Goss, the master of the National Grange, delivered an address that treated in part with the agricultural problems of this time. He discussed profiteering and price controls very intelligently. I am sorry that I cannot elaborate on his views. I can only say that the farmer is much interested in any action the President may take with regard to price fixing. Care must be taken not to disrupt the production of food which is the responsibility of the farmers. Agriculture is our greatest industry. In our last great national depression agriculture was the first to suffer deflation. We must not permit that to happen again for now we not only feed ourselves but much of the world depends upon us for food.

Mr. Speaker, the matter of food production in our country is now a great business. There are many factors that must be considered and these factors must cooperate. Up-to-date farms now must have electric energy. The development of rural electrification has been an interesting topic with the farmers of Ohio. I think Ohio leads or is near the lead in rural electrification, and practically every farm home in Ohio is now supplied with electricity.

I am proud that I had a very important part in forming the Buckeye rural electrification unit which now is one of the largest units in the State. The first meeting in connection with the formation of this unit was held in the courthouse at Gallipolis and I went all the way from Washington to attend it. I attended several other meetings there and have consulted frequently with the directors and management of this big concern. This unit has now expanded until it serves most of the farmers in seven counties. An announcement has been made today by the Rural Electrification Administration that an additional allotment of $475,000 has been made to the Buckeye rural electrification unit. This amount is to be expended in Meigs, Gallia, Lawrence, Jackson, Vinton, and Athens Counties. It is planned to build 146 miles of new lines to serve 515 additional families. The remainder of this allotment is to be used in repairs and maintenance.

I hope that the board of directors and the management of this very large project will give to it their best service and thereby guarantee to these hundreds of patrons good service at reasonable cost.

Mr. Speaker, I leave off as I began by saying that our two most urgent problems are: First, wipe out communism; second, take immediate action to prevent unfair profiteering and exorbitant prices.

Aid to European Industry May Backfire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article from the Los Angeles Examiner of February 28, 1950, in regard to the possibility of United States aid to European industry backfiring.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES AID TO EUROPE INDUSTRY SHOWING SIGNS OF BACKFIRING

(By J. W. Ward)

Industry in the United States is beginning to feel effects of extraordinary efforts by the Government to stimulate foreign trade by reducing tariffs and financing industries of foreign countries.

So long as European nations were flat on their backs after the end of hostilities, there was no objection in giving them all the help possible, not only to alleviate suffering but to put their industries in position to resume operations.

The Marshall plan was the result of this altruistic policy of the Government. Since its initiation billions of dollars have been poured into the industries of these nations. As a result, production of many goods has attained almost prewar proportions and some of these are entering world markets in competition with American products.

Some businessmen now are beginning to wonder if it is possible that we went, and are going, just a little too far in our efforts to help the suffering peoples of the world and make them self-supporting.

Not only was money in huge amounts given them, but the latest and most improved automatic and labor-saving machines were sent to them and in addition they were given opportunity to learn all we know about mass production, the process which is the basis of the industrial greatness of this country.

Now it is dawning upon Americans that these foreign firms which a few years ago were bankrupt, poorly equipped and badly managed, now have ample finances, the latest and best machinery, and men at their heads who have had the opportunity to study the latest American methods of production.

It is these newly born industries which are entering the world markets to compete with American goods. With equal facilities and a much lower scale of wages, they are dangerous competitors.

Lowering of protective duties under the guise of assisting foreign industry also is coming in for its share of criticism.

At a recent meeting of the Paper and Pulp Association in New York, E. W. Tinker, executive secretary, asserted that further lowering of import tariffs by the United States was potentially harmful to the industry, and could result in numerous "Waltham" failures.

Mr. Tinker stated that the industry is not opposed to increased international trade, but moves to change the tariff structures under which the industry has grown, have caused grave concern.

"Potential effects on employment, payrolls, taxes and dividends," he declared, "was and is a major issue.

"Unless the situation with respect to the paper industry is handled judiciously a multiplicity of instances comparable to the town of Waltham easily could occur."

Burma and Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter addressed to me from the American Embassy in Rangoon, Burma, in connection with Burma's support of the United Nations in Korea.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOREIGN SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
AMERICAN EMBASSY,
Rangoon, Burma, September 15, 1950.

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: May I congratulate you on the timeliness of your statement, congratulating Burma on her support for the UN in Korea. As soon as USIS received your text and that of Mrs. BOLTON, copies were made and they were presented by our Ambassador to the Prime Minister, Thakin Nu, so that he had them before the press. Then, in this morning's press, the statements were given great prominence on page 1 in at least two newspapers, the Daily Gazette and the Nation.

The statements arrived at a time when we were running into a little Red-promoted misunderstanding over the ECA agreement. So, coming on top of a press conference that we urged the Burmese Government to have on ECA, your statements just helped that much more to allay suspicions and to lay the groundwork for sound United States policy in this area.

The following incident might interest you. While Parliament was considering the Korean question last week, the assistant to the Attorney General came to the USIS Library to ask for 200 copies of our pamphlet, the United Nations and Korea. He wanted them for distribution to all members of Parliament. He was given the 200 copies of that pamphlet and also 20 copies of the UN Bulletin reprint, Enforcing the Peace in Korea. The day following Parliament's vote to support the United Nations' decision, the same gentleman returned to the library to express the Attorney General's appreciation. He reported that the pamphlets had supplied the arguments which helped beat down the opposition. The Prime Minister was given an overwhelming vote of support, much to the discomfort of our enemies.

My best wishes, believe me, and regards to Senators LODGE and SALTONSTALL and Congressman JOHN HESELTON (from one of their constituents), and to Senators BILL BENTON, KARL MUNDT, and the "V. P." when you see them.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE W. EDMAN,
Public Affairs Officer.

OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a news dispatch which appeared in the New York Times of September 9, 1950, relative to the refusal of the International Longshoremen's Association to unload Russian cargoes in New York City.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALL RUSSIAN GOODS TO BE BOYCOTTED—DOCKMEN ANNOUNCE DECISION AFTER GOVERNMENT FAILS TO LIST ESSENTIALS

Lacking specific instruction from Government officials, the membership of the International Longshoremen's Association on this coast will make no exceptions in its boycott of Russian cargoes, Joseph P. Ryan, International Longshoremen's Association president, announced yesterday afternoon.

The union had agreed earlier in the week to handle cargo necessary to national defense or civilian economy despite its Russian origin, but asked Secretary of Labor Maurice J. Tobin to advise the union what cargoes would fall into these categories.

Mr. Ryan said the union's Atlantic district council had received no answer to its telegram of Wednesday to Mr. Tobin, and therefore would continue to boycott all Russian cargo.

"It is up to someone in authority in either the Army or Navy to convince us that the cargo is essential to the national defense program before the men will touch it," he said.

The Atlantic district council, Mr. Ryan said, has instructed the longshoremen to handle all cargoes to and from satellite countries until some definite policy can be decided, but he conceded that there was little likelihood of the order being obeyed at present.

The union president reported that a meeting of the council on satellite cargoes was scheduled for Monday afternoon, after a wage review meeting with representatives of the employing stevedores. He expressed the hope that some sort of advice would be forthcoming from Mr. Tobin by that time.

Mr. Ryan declared it was significant that Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer, a member of the President's Cabinet, should issue a statement in Washington on Thursday urging Congress to look into the question of curbing imports from Russia. He said the Secretary's views coincided with the position taken by the union.

The matter of handling Russian and satellite nation cargoes was put before the Atlantic coast district council when it met here Wednesday.

The council supported the men and the New York district council in the ban on general Russian cargoes, but agreed to the handling of all essential military or civilian goods. The group asked for official designation of cargoes necessary for national defense or civilian economy and deferred action on satellite country goods pending receipt of such information.

We Must Not Be Misled by the Appearance of an Improvement in World Conditions Into Reducing or Slowing Down Our Defense Preparations—We Must Hold to a Consistent Policy Designed To Develop Our Strength and the Strength of the Free World Until the Basic Difficulties Are Removed

OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, there has been more or less discussion with respect to the manner in which various components of the armed services are being inducted in order to meet this present crisis. It is to be remembered that this action, although now centralized in Korea, could at any moment easily be exploded into full-blown global warfare. I am happy to say that the First District of Alabama, now as in past wars, is more than doing its part in supplying all types of component troops to the United States Army, Navy, Air Force, and marines.

It was my pleasure, on Thursday, September 14, to have as my guests, at a luncheon given in the Speaker's room, some 78 officers and enlisted men, members of the Nine Hundred and Eighty-sixth Petroleum Distribution Company of the United States Engineers. All were reservists, stationed temporarily at Fort Belvoir en route from their little home town of Monroeville, Monroe County, Ala., in my own First District, on their way to Korea.

Seating space in the Speaker's dining room alone precluded my having the entire Alabama congressional delegation present to honor these splendid men. Many were no longer in their teens, and many others had served their country in World War II. A vast number, along with battle ribbons and medals, had received the Purple Heart. It was indeed an inspiring sight to sit, break bread with them—and then realize that here were Americans going to far off Korea in order to fight for the freedom and right of the Koreans to worship God under a representative government just the same as they would fight for those rights in their own homeland in the first district of Alabama.

Mr. Speaker, we missed your presence at that luncheon. The table, however, was honored by the presence of the senior Senator from Alabama, the Honorable Lister Hill; Maj. Gen. William E. Hall, director of legislation and liaison, United States Air Force; Brig. Gen. Robert E. L. Eaton, deputy director, Office of Legislative Liaison, OSD; Maj. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, represented by Col. E. Fred Klinke; the Honorable Dewey Short, ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee; as well as the Honorable Leo E. Allen, ranking on the all-powerful Rules Committee of the House. The burden of the talks delivered by these Members of Congress and general officers of our armed services will linger with me and the men of the Nine Hundred and Eighty-sixth Petroleum Distribution Company of the United States Engineers as long as we live.

Mr. Speaker, when one looked out over that assembly it causes one to speculate as to just why our Nation is calling in such numbers upon the reservists of all services, and this question had not been answered to the satisfaction of the Nation's Congress or its peoples until it was answered in Fort Worth, Tex., on Friday, September 29, by the Honorable Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary of the Air Force.

In Fort Worth, before the Air Reserve Association Convention, Secretary Finletter presented such an exemplary talk that I feel that the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD could not be better employed than to afford the broadest possible dissemination of the text of that memorable address to all Members of the House and of the United States Armed Service Forces.

Mr. Finletter approached the problem which faces the Reserve forces of the armed services by way of friendly counseling rather than the ordinary lofty, detached view that one might expect from those trained under military discipline. It was the full and altogether sympathetic understanding with which he approached the problem that engrossed the minds of Reserves in attendance at the convention.

Mr. Finletter laid the ghosts of rumor and of conjecture by a simple recitation of the conditions which existed as of the very hour at which he spoke. His was an honest evaluation of future actions as they might easily pertain to the reservists already in uniform, as well as to all others awaiting the call to duty.

Recognizing and discussing the two basic problems confronting the members of the Reserve forces of the United States Air Force, Secretary Finletter dealt with each in a forthright manner. Where there was no immediate answer to some singular pertinent question, he honestly acknowledged that fact and even averted any intent of building false hopes in the hearts of his hearers.

In advancing this discussion, Mr. Finletter pointed out that many members of the Reserve forces were being called to duty for a purpose that probably, as he stated, had never entered their minds when they contracted to train in peacetime in order to serve in the case of grave threat to their country.

The United Nations' action in Korea—far remote from their homeland in the strict sense of the word—would not constitute the grave threat to their Nation. However, Mr. Finletter clearly pointed out that while the action thus far was not total mobilization, and therefore caused inconvenience to but a portion of the reservists, still the country has thus far been able to avert all-out war, and is carrying on a policy of doing its utmost to avert such an all-out war.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Finletter's talk on the situation of our Reserve forces, before the Air Force Reserve Association, is just the kind of a talk that this country his learned to expect from Tom Finletter—frank, honest, clear, temporate—it inspires the confidence of all in the ability, understanding, and driving force of the man who now is Secretary of our great Department of the Air, and who has already distinguished himself as one of our greatest and most able public officials.

With these thoughts in mind, I commend this talk to every Member of this Congress, and feel it to be one of the most forthright, sympathetic, and honest expressions on public policy that I have ever heard.

It is because of the foregoing that I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include in the RECORD the address of Secretary Finletter before the Air Reserve Association.

That talk is as follows:

I propose this morning to discuss with you openly some of the problems which are facing you and therefore are facing the Air Force.

It is of course redundant for me to speak of the vital importance and the splendid work of the Air Force Reserve and the Air National Guard up to the present time. It would be futile to review the vital part that the Air Force Reserve and the Air National Guard played in World War II and the part they have been playing since then. Some idea of the importance of the role of the Air Force Reserve in the pre-Korean structure of the Air Force can be seen from one statistic, namely, that prior to the Korean war there were 35,126 Air Force Reserve officers on full time duty; and that these 35,126 Air Force Reserve officers represented 61.1 percent of the total number of officers in the Air Force. And since Korea these figures have been increased. The initial recall program, calling for approximately 50,000 Air Force Reserve officers and airmen to be brought to active duty, is expected to be completed soon. Included in these figures are the two Air Reserve wings which are already on duty. In addition five Air National Guard groups and two Air Reserve wings have been alerted for recall and soon will be in training.

The Reserves—and I am now referring to both the Air Force Reserve and the Air National Guard—are an essential element of the Air Force Establishment. But perhaps of more importance to you at this moment than how important you are is the question of certain difficulties which face you and your colleagues of the Air National Guard.

As we see it, there are two main types of problems which concern you. The first is that class of problem which affects those who have been called to active service—that is the four Reserve wings which have been or are being called, the five Air National Guard groups who will soon be on duty, and the numbers of air reservists who were neither on active duty before or who have been called to duty as a result of the Korean war and the basic build-up in the National Military Establishment. Many problems face these officers and men who are on active duty, the main one being no doubt the period for which their services will be required. There are, I realize, many other problems which affect those officers and men who are or will be on active duty—and these will be discussed during the course of your convention—but I take it that the main one is the length of service.

But secondly there are problems of very great seriousness which are affecting those of you who are in the Air Force Reserve and have not as yet been called, a problem which also affects those units of the Air National Guard who have not been summoned for active duty. These men must be deeply concerned about the uncertainty of their position. This uncertainty not only affects their careers but must be very unsatisfactory in all their business and commercial affairs. I can well see how this uncertainty must interfere in many of the relationships of the reservists with their firms and companies—to say nothing of the greater interference with their personal lives and their family relationships.

Now the Air Force, as well as the Army and Navy, is trying to do something about this question through a coordinated and uniform deferment policy. In the Department of Defense there is a Civilian Componénts Policy Board currently studying this problem and every effort will be made to establish procedures which are reasonable and equitable. The Air Force is aware of many changes in the status of reservists in the past few years. We know that new skills have been achieved and some old skills have been lost. We also know that same reservists are no longer eligible for military duty because of health or because of critical employment or other responsibilities which take precedence over military service. Criteria for deferment have been established on a uniform basis for the Department of Defense. Machinery to administer the criteria in the three military departments is in operation. Members of the headquarters staff are here with you in this convention and are prepared to discuss all individual problems. General Hoag, who is the Special Assistant to the Chief of Staff, General Vandenberg, for Reserve forces, is here and I understand that he will speak to you on these matters in further detail.

But the main point which I want to make to you this morning is that the Air Force is aware of the difficulties and uncertainties of the position of all reservists.

I regret to say that I do not now have solutions to all of these difficult problems to offer you. I do, however, want to make it clear that we are fully aware in the Air Force of these difficulties and the burdens they place on you—on those who have been called up and those who have not been called up. I want to assure you, too, that we are devoting our most earnest efforts to alleviating this situation, to try to make clear to you just as soon as possible how the problem is developing and what the prospects look like. It is only the gravity of the international scene which has compelled the action which has been taken.

One thing has stood out clearly in our minds as we have looked at this troublesome problem, and that is the cause of it. As we see it, in very broad terms the reservist—and I am using this term to include the Air National Guard and all the Air Force Reserve—voluntarily took membership in their respective Reserves because of a desire to serve their country. These volunteers wished to be in a position to serve rapidly and effectively in case the country should be forced into war. These volunteers, whether they had formerly served in the armed services or not could, if they had so wished have taken no responsibility with respect to the future. They could have gone about their own civilian ways, standing ready to serve their country in the event of war but without any training during the period of peace. Instead of this they determined to fit themselves in time of peace for a possible war, to take time off from civilian pursuits at expense of leisure and possibly of position, in order to prepare themselves to serve their country.

This must be rated as a patriotic act of the highest devotion. These reservists—again using the term in the broad sense—no doubt felt that their peacetime obligation would be limited to training and that they would not be called involuntarily to serve except in the case of a grave threat to their country. Now the situation is that they are being called upon to serve under circumstances which however grave they may be still are less than a full mobilization of the country's total manpower. I submit that this is the root of the difficulty. If the country were in all-out war for survival, these particular problems which are concerning you today would disappear—and of course much greater ones would befall all of us. In short it is the very fact that the country has been able to avert all-out war and is carrying on a policy of doing its utmost to avert such an all-out war which causes a great deal of inconveniences and problems which beset the reservists of today.

Now the answer to this would be provided of course if there were assured peace in the world which would enable this country to have a small military establishment which would not require the service of the Reserve units. But unfortunately this kind of peace has not been possible with the international scene as it is today, and therefore the country has been forced into having a large Defense Establishment in a time such as the present. This Defense Establishment must be large as long as the international scene remains as it is. For unless we do have a military force of the proper size and strength to give it authority, we will lessen the hope that our combined political and military policies may be able to avert war.

The reservists are therefore being called into service or being subjected to the uncertainties of possibly being called into service in a noble cause. The Armed Forces of the country are actually engaged in fighting, and fighting of an extremely serious nature. At the same time our basic military establishment is being built up to give strength to our policies of peace. Anyone who is in the Reserves—whether he be in the actual fighting in Korea, or whether he be in civilian life with the uncertainty of possible call hanging over him—is therefore rendering service of the very greatest importance to his country. For without this reservoir of Reserve strength the United States would not be able to provide a quick build-up of its peacetime force in being. Without the reservists it might not be able to build up this peacetime strength quickly enough to serve the all-important purposes of national security which it is now serving.

Those who may not be called are also serving a need of the country. For the Air Reserve program must go on. The Reserve is such a vital part of the air establishment that our Reserve training program is being intensified and reprogramed in accordance with the new and special needs of the Air Force and the special qualifications of the reservists.

Surely this is about as important a work as anyone in this country could undertake. And if it bears particularly hard upon you, and indeed if it bears somewhat unexpectedly upon you, there is only this one possible consolation. It is that while the work you are now doing is not that which you may have anticipated—for it is not actually engaging in all-out survival war for your country—it is a call to duty of the very highest and indispensable nature. You are in a sense being called upon to pay the price for your patriotism by being in the front of those who wish to serve their country. You are being called on first. It is a position of honor and one for which the country must be always grateful.

Now this I know must be in some ways cold comfort to you, but the point I am trying to make this morning is that the Air Force is aware not only of the importance of your work but of the sacrifices which your work entails.

I want to assure you that your problems keenly concern us. I have said that I do not have adequate solutions for all these difficulties to offer you at this time. But this is not because of any negligence on our part or for any lack of deep concern about your problems. It is because the international situation today is extremely changeable and because of the needs of the Defense Establishment of the United States and therefore of the Air Force are to a certain extent affected by the fluctuations of the international scene. But I must add that until the world conditions which will create a real peace—and not merely the illusion of peace—are established we must keep on with the building up of our Armed Forces without regard to the immediate happenings of the day. We must not be misled by the appearance of an improvement in world conditions into reducing or slowing down our defense preparations. We must hold to a consistent policy designed to develop our strength and the strength of the free world until the basic difficulties are removed.

I cannot assure you that the international situation is going to change for the better in the immediate future. The only thing that I can say is that, we intend to call you only when necessary, to process you with consideration for the problems you face, to keep you only as long as you are really needed, to employ you effectively when you are in the service, and to study earnestly how we can handle your problems fairly and with consideration for your special difficulties.

In addition to the problem of those who must serve at a sacrifice we have also the problem of those Reserves who have been on active duty for a considerable number of years and who wish to continue on active duty. We have never been able to give these men a definite promise as to the number of years they may expect to remain on active duty. During the past year budgetary limitations forced us to relieve some of these men, even though they did not wish to be relieved. Some relinquished their ratings as air crew members because of the same budgetary restrictions. In many cases we are now offering them the opportunity to renew their ratings or to resume their active duty. These uncertainties are not to our liking, and I assure you that the Air Force would not impose them on its personnel except for circumstances beyond its control.

As I have said, we hope to be able to lessen the number and degree of uncertainties which we are forced to impose upon you and we shall press the necessary measures with all possible speed. In the meantime the services of some of you will be required for the defense of the Nation. I know that despite the inconveniences and despite the inevitable uncertainties which may continue for some time, you will find satisfaction and cause for pride in the fact that you have been called upon to make your contribution as citizens and as airmen.

Imports Threaten Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD several news dispatches concerning the threat to industry by foreign imports.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Sunday Globe of January 8, 1950]

MAYOR CHARGES STATE DEPARTMENT HAS SOLD CITY DOWN THE RIVER—IMPORTS THREATEN TO END GLOUCESTER FISHING FLEET

(By Paul F. Kneeland)

Gloucester has been the biggest fishing port in the Nation ever since 1623, but there's no future in it now, according to the city's new mayor, John J. Burke, Jr. And any week now—perhaps even any day—the Gloucester fishing industry may actually founder or run up on the rocks of bankruptcy.

How come? Fish imported from Canada, Iceland, and Greenland sells for less than Gloucester fish does—it's cheaper to produce because of lower labor costs in those countries. Also, there is no quota on foreign fish and the tariff on it is very light.

So, Burke recommends: (1) A quota on imports; (2) a heavier tariff, and (3) immediate RFC loans to boat owners and processors who have already started hoisting distress signals.

"Right now the industry is in dangerous waters," the mayor warns. "If Washington doesn't answer our S O S immediately, we're sunk.

"No; without immediate relief, I can promise you that half the Gloucester fishing fleet will be tied up at the wharves under a marshal's sale—and with no one to buy."

Incidentally, Burke would suffer personally, too, in the event of such collapse; he's co-owner of 25 fishing vessels, the New England Fillet Co. of Gloucester and the Gloucester Seafoods Corp. He also runs a Gloucester diner and filling station.

"I'm a businessman, not a politician," says Burke, a short, stocky man in his early forties—a member of the class of 1930 at Brown, he was a guard on the football team and looks it.

"My father was a lawyer like myself, and I practiced for a while when I graduated from Harvard Law School and passed the bar in 1933. But being the grandson of a seafaring man, I have always been a fisherman at heart, I guess.

"Frankly, I don't want to sit out my 2-year term and watch Gloucester's mainstay—the fishing industry—give way to heavily subsidized foreign competition."

Commenting on his 5,500-word inaugural address Monday in which he charged that "the Gloucester fishing industry has lost practically all semblance of protection under the present reciprocal-trade agreements," Burke adds:

I WANT A FAST ANSWER

"The State Department has sold Gloucester down the river. I want a mighty fast answer to that one."

First step in this direction will be the organization of a citizens' committee comprising representatives of all phases of the industry—owners, fishermen, machine shops, chandlers, processors, etc.—and a march on the Capitol would result.

Meanwhile, here's how crucial the situation, as Burke points out, is today:

(a) Of Gloucester's $10,000,000 fleet of 150 vessels, only 10 are operating at a profit—the other 140 are in the red.

(b) Ships' supply houses have been extending easy credit terms left and right—otherwise some owners would have been forced to tie up their vessels months ago.

(c) An out-of-work fisherman makes more money while collecting his $25 a week or so State unemployment insurance than he does while on a voyage—the fabulous $200-a-day wages are a thing of World War II times.

(d) There hasn't been a new vessel built in either Maine or Massachusetts shipyards for the past 2 years—an ominous sign.

(e) The cost of producing Port-of-Glouster fish makes it impossible to compete with foreign fish—at the present time, Gloucester fish is being sold below cost in order to get back part of the money invested.

STATE DEPARTMENT "CHOWDER HEADS"

"That one-world theory those chowder heads in the State Department rave about is going to ruin us," Burke continues.

"They claim that, for example, the country which can produce fish at the lowest possible cost should do so.

"All right, Canada can do it and we can't. Why? Because women in Nova Scotia fish-processing plants get 37 cents an hour; here women doing the same job get $1 an hour. The Nova Scotian man's pay in fish-processing plants is 50 cents an hour; here men doing the same job get $1.50 an hour.

"What the State Department overlooks completely in their comparisons is the standard of living. Any school kid knows that the United States has the highest standards of living of any country in the world. The State Department doesn't say anything about that—oh, no! When it comes to us, they're unsympathetic and inconsiderate—ask about our problems and they show about as much life as a barrel of salt cod.

"Are Gloucestermen, their wives and children, supposed to reduce standards of living?" Burke questioned contemptuously, "just so they can compete with the Canadian market?"

Take these differences in per-pound wholesale fish quotations:

	Cents
Canada:
Redfish	1–1½
Haddock	2–3
United States:
Redfish	4–5
Haddock	7–9

If a 90-foot, 400-horsepower Gloucester beam trawler goes on an 8-day fishing trip off St. Pierre and the Sable Islands, it must gross at least $5,000. And if the price on fish drops below 7 cents a pound, "Then it's just too bad," Burke interjects. "A beam trawler cannot operate and break even if fish is selling under 7 cents. Look at these Canadian quotations—what can we do about it?"

And Burke elaborates on his (1) quotas, (2) tariff, and (3) RFC solutions:

"(1) Last year, 1949, the United States imported 60,000,000 pounds of frozen fillets; it should be limited this year to a quota of not more than 40,000,000 pounds.

"SOME DIFFERENCE

"(2) Increase the tariff. Recently one of my vessels became disabled and $1,100 of my catch was unloaded in Canada. Canada considered it an import and the tariff was $400. Now, if that had been a Canadian vessel disabled off the United States coast and unloaded here, the tariff would have been $11 on an $1,100 valuation. Some difference, huh?

"(3) RFC loans are vital in order to protect everybody in the industry, everybody from producer to processor. During the last war, the United States gave $30,000,000 worth of fishing vessels and equipment to foreign countries, including 19 beam trawlers worth $250,000 each. How about a little peacetime spending for our benefit for a change?"

Gloucester fisheries have invested a small fortune in a national advertising campaign during the past decade—"fish should be on your diet" was the theme. It went over big and increased the per capita consumption of fish from 3½ pounds yearly (1938) to 13 pounds yearly (1948).

But imports have increased 500 percent since 1946, leaving this sad-to-tell situation in 1949:

Total Gloucester catch, 300,000,000 pounds; fillets made from this catch and frozen, 90,000,000 pounds; total imports of frozen fillets, 60,000,000 pounds.

GLOUCESTER FISH IN FREEZERS

"All the imports were sold," Burke complains, "but there are still 10,000,000 pounds of Gloucester fillets left in the freezers as of this moment. With new imports coming in all the time, it means production will be topping sales, and those 10,000,000 pounds of frozen Gloucester fillets will have to be sold at less than cost."

The big catch—it's about 50 percent of Gloucester's total—is redfish. Next in line are mackerel, codfish, halibut, flounder, pollock, and swordfish. Since the mid-thirties, when frozen fish was introduced, 90 percent of the catch is frozen after filleting; the rest is canned, dried and salted, pickled and smoked.

Recently "trash fish"—unmarketable as food for human consumption—like porgies and parts of fish discarded in the filleting process, have been cooked, pressed, and converted into animal food, oils, and fish solubles.

"But the cent or cent and one-quarter per pound paid for this 'trash fish' doesn't come anywhere near balancing the industry's budget," Burke adds.

"Two-thirds of Gloucester's 25,000 people are employed in the fishing industry. They're not asking for subsidies, although Canadian fisheries, processing plants, and vessel owners get up to 50 percent subsidization. All Gloucester's fishing industry wants is adequate protection for her great production."

CHEAPER FOREIGN GOODS BEGIN TO CUT A SWATH IN DOMESTIC MARKETS—THEY HIT UNITED STATES CHINAWARE, GLOVES, SEWING MACHINES, AND SIMULATED PEARLS—PROTESTS REACH WASHINGTON

(By Edward Bejan)

Makers of a significant scattering of items—from simulated pearls to sewing machines to chinaware—are getting those import jitters once again.

Reason for the latest reoccurance of a well-known prewar ailment: Goods from Japan and Europe are entering the United States market in increasing volume and at prices domestic producers find hard to meet.

Take the Gelmart Knitting Mills, Inc., of Yonkers, N. Y. This firm has cut back its production of wool and cotton gloves 80 percent from a year ago. Gelmart still considers itself lucky, however, because it was able to get a supply of nylon for glove-making. President Arthur Goldsmith explains the switch to the synthetic fabric: "Japan sells cotton string gloves to American jobbers at $5 for a dozen pairs. We have to get $9.75 a dozen, since our labor costs alone amount to $5."

Other glove makers in the same Hudson River town are not so lucky. Reports the Hega Knitting Mills: "We're operating at 25 percent of capacity and our break-even point is 60 percent. And the outlook is worse. We may be forced to close down next year." The Sternwild Knitting Mills, Inc., which usually halted regular output for 30 days around this time of the year for sample-making, says it will be slower resuming operations this year; the company's output before the current shutdown was running 25 to 30 percent below a year ago. The York Glove Mills, also in Yonkers, looks for a 50-percent drop in its 1950 volume.

THEY WERE DIFFERENT

American producers in the postwar era have tended to regard most imported products as different from home-made goods rather than as a competitive threat. They have in mind such things as Scotch whisky, Irish linen, and Belgian lace. Now, however, many a manufacturer sees foreign wares directly threatening his markets.

Up and down New York's Worth Street, textile hub of the country, merchants are keeping a nervous eye on Japanese cotton-goods quotations. Dealers report some Nipponese-made grey textiles have already entered the United States at prices as much as 35 percent below those for corresponding American wares. One result: Anglo-American textile men are planning to send an exploratory group to Japan to size up the situation.

Wool fabric makers are alarmed at the influx—at lower than domestic prices—of English and Italian merchandise. Better quality imported goods, according to trade reports, are landing duty-paid at $1.50 to $2 a yard below current New York quotations.

Dinnerware manufacturers are more than alarmed: They cite Japanese and German imports as the main factor behind an estimated 25-percent dip in their sales last year below 1948. The Jackson Vitrified China Co., which claims to produce the least expensive chinaware set in the United States, says it is unable to meet Japanese prices.

Reports Philip Distillator, Jackson's president: "A few months ago, Japanese producers trimmed the wholesale price of a typical 12-piece set from about $42 to $30. Our set was $50 then. We were forced to come down to $40, but we can't go any lower."

SEWING-MACHINE HEADS FROM JAPAN

Fulking large in the sewing-machine field are imports of Japanese heads—machines not yet installed in cabinets or equipped with electric motors. A spokesman for big Singer Manufacturing Co. estimates these are coming in by the thousands. One importer reports his sales of heads rose from about $10,000 in 1948 to well over $100,000 last year.

Several American manufacturers and distributors specialized in putting the Nipponese machines in cabinets and outfitting them with motors. Some do their own importing under exclusive contracts with Japanese plants. One of these, Bega Bros. Products Corp., says its sales of the imported machines have increased 200 percent over 1948. Morse Sewing Machine, which imports a unit to retail at $139, claims its current volume is running 25 percent over 1948 and "we sell everything we bring over."

A bargain-hunter can pick up an inexpensive console-type Japanese-make machine today for around $95. In contrast, the cheapest Singer console model retails for $164.50.

Another major Japanese import—simulated, glass-base pearls—is gaining a foothold in American markets. To meet the wholesale price of the imported beads—$1.50 a dozen necklaces in New York—United States makers have been forced to use plastic-base pearls. The catch is that domestic consumers prefer the glass-base pearls which are heavier and fit more snugly.

Some simulated pearl manufacturers, finding it difficult to meet this Japanese competition, are solving the problem by becoming importers. Ditchik Bros., for example, has trimmed its output some 50 percent and is importing merchandise to offset that cutback. Spencer Novelty Manufacturing Co. is now importing 25 percent of the wares it's selling.

BULB COMPETITION

"Killing" is the term used by flower bulb growers to describe competition from Holland. Says Arend Schravendeel of Schravendeel & Segers Sons, Inc.: "We should get $20 a thousand for gladiola bulbs but we have to sell at $9 to $10 to meet the Dutch price. Back in 1947, gladiola bulbs were bringing $45 to $50 a thousand." Mr. Schravendeel has watched his production at Palmyra, N. Y., from 52 acres in 1948 to 15 acres today "and I don't know whether I'm going to be able to keep that much going."

Charges of foreign "dumping" are beginning to reach the Federal Tariff Commission in Washington. Among them: The Northwest Bulb Growers Association says the Dutch sometimes sell narcissus bulbs at a loss in this country to get badly needed dollars. The S. S. White Dental Manufacturing Co., Ransom & Randolph Co., and Lee S. Smith & Son Manufacturing Co. have lodged complaints that German dental burs offered to American buyers at $2.88 a gross are being sold to Brazilians for $3.60. American-made dental burs range from $5.82 to $7.73 a gross.

Several protesting groups are seeking import curbs and higher duties. These include northwestern nut growers, who ask a 50-percent hike in duties, and the Association of Knitted Glove and Mitten Manufacturers, which is pressing for a quota on shipments to this country.

Their chances of getting such restrictions, manufacturers agree, are slim. ECA and other Government officials have long been urging increased imports to close the trade gap; United States overseas purchases still lag far behind shipments abroad.

Lower labor costs are a big factor in foreign manufacturers' successful invasion of American markets. One United States maker of knitted berets, for instance, declares his labor costs are five to eight times those prevailing in France and Czechoslovakia. A manufacturer of wool fabrics puts his labor bill at triple the English level and five times the Italian rate.

Ability of overseas producers to make speedier delivery than before is also aiding the sale of foreign goods. And finally, say importers, merchandise produced abrpad has improved considerably in quality during the past year. Harold Wilson, president of the British Board of Trade, mentions that he didn't hear a single complaint about the quality of English wares during a recent trip to United States cities.

FELT HAT MAKERS' UNION HIT IMPORTS—CALL UPON TARIFF COMMISSION FOR RELIEF—BANKRUPTCIES, JOB LOSSES CHARGED

Tariff concessions on fur felt hat bodies for women's hats have boosted imports by more than 300 percent, according to a joint statement of labor and management of the hat body industry issued yesterday. The situation warrants a review of the reciprocal trade agreement program as applied to the hat industry, it was said, and the United States Tariff Commission was called upon to act.

An application to the Commission, signed yesterday by Warren Smith, secretary of the Hat Institute, and Max Zaritsky, president of the United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers International Union, outlined the sharp rise in fur felt hat body imports. In 1946 imports resumed the prewar pattern of approximately 5 percent of domestic production.

Following the tariff concessions granted in the Geneva trade agreement of 1947 they rose from 37,000 dozen in 1946 to 112,000 for the first 10 months of 1949.

The latter figure indicates a jump from 5 percent of domestic production to almost 20 percent, the application stated, and has been an important contributory factor to the 36 percent drop in the number of hat industry productive workers since 1937.

According to Hat Institute figures, in 1937 an average of 4,426 workers were employed in the women's hat body segment of the industry. In 1949, the number of workers in this division of the industry fell to 2,310. Figures of actual man-hours worked reveal a parallel decline of 1,500,000 man-hours in the same period. Moreover, effect on the domestic industry has been such that several long-established companies have gone bankrupt and there has been noticeable hardship in certain localities where the hat industry is the economic lifeblood of the community.

The application went on to say that benefits of the tariff concessions to foreign nations were not manifest. The hat industry imports virtually all its raw materials consisting of furs and skins and exports only a negligible quantity of the manufactured product. Increases in imports of hat bodies and finished fur felt hats acts to reduce the import of raw materials, and thus offsets the benefits of the reciprocal international trade program.

In requesting action by the Tariff Commission, the applicants emphasized that both labor and managements were in sympathy with and recognized the need for tariff concessions as a means of fostering world trade. It was pointed out, however, that the threat to its existence which the concessions implied, made it mandatory for the industry to obtain a review.

HATTERS' UNION OFFICIAL WARNS OF TRADE'S RUIN BY UNITED STATES IMPORT POLICY—SAYS IRON CURTAIN NATIONS WITH SLAVE LABOR OUTPUT CAN TURN DANBURY INTO GHOST TOWN

WASHINGTON.—American hat workers cannot compete with iron curtain slave labor and survive, Marx Lewis, general secretary of the AFL United Hatters, Cap, and Millinery Workers, warned here. If imports of competing goods increase or even continue at their present rate, hat-manufacturing towns like Danbury, Conn., "will be reduced to ghost towns," Mr. Lewis prohphesied.

He was here as a member of the executive committee of the National Labor-Management Committee on Foreign Trade Policy.

The committee, representing nearly a score of industries which say they are being unfairly affected by foreign imports, met in closed session to discuss problems raised by America's foreign trade policy.

Also representing the hat industry on the executive committee is David Harshaw, president of the Hat Institute, Inc., and president of the John B. Stetson Co.

Mr. Lewis said Czechoslovak imports are presenting the chief problem to hat manufacturing concerns such as those in Danbury. Imports from this iron curtain country have increased 300 percent since the end of the war, he asserted.

The position of the hat industry is similar to that of the other industries represented in the National Labor-Management Committee on Foreign Trade Policy, he said.

"A billion dollars' worth of imports will not seriously affect the American economy, but if only a few industries, and especially smaller industries, are made to assume a disproportionate share of the burden caused by such imports, then the situation can be ruinous," he said.

It is planned to present the hat industry's problem to a House Labor Subcommittee set up to study the effect imports are having on American labor and employment, Mr. Lewis stated.

The United States Tariff Commission is conducting a preliminary survey of the hat industry's problems.

It has been suggested by some Government spokesmen that hat workers and others similarly affected try training for other types of work, Mr. Lewis said.

"It won't work. Hat workers have been in the industry too long to be retrained for other work," he declared.

STEEL IMPORTERS TAKE BUSINESS FROM UNITED STATES WAREHOUSES BY QUOTING LOWER PRICES

One Eastern steel warehouseman says: "We can't possibly compete with the importers." The latter offer 7 percent to 8 percent lower prices on such products as hot-rolled bars and structurals. That puts their quotations below what the warehouses—the steel industry's retailers—pay the mills for these items.

The incoming steel is shipped from Belgium, Luxemburg, Britain, France, and Germany. Last year's currency devaluations laid the groundwork for the lower import prices.

Imports of semifinished steel, rising rapidly in the late months of 1949 following devaluation, reached 300,000 tons for the year. That was about double the 1948 total.

COLOMBIA TO INCREASE ITS IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES, FINANCE MINISTER SAYS

Colombia expects to increase imports from the United States by 30 percent this year to around $400,000,000, acording to Dr. Herman Jaramillo-Ocampo, Colombian Minister of Finance.

This increase is made possible by higher coffee prices and the dollar savings from restrictions maintained by the country on imports of all but essential goods, Dr. Jaramillo stated.

Dr. Jaramillo has been in Washington representing Colombia at the Economic and Social Conference of the Pan American Union. He will return to Colombia next week.

"Colombia is enjoying a very healthy economic and fiscal situation with bright prospects for the future," he stated. "The metallic reserves of the Bank of the Republic have reached $135,000,000; they were $80,000,000 in April 1949. International payments for commercial operations and for external public debt are up to date."

Dr. Jaramillo listed several steps that Colombia is taking to continue its economic development. He stated that a special banking mission of the Federal Reserve Board will soon leave for Colombia to aid the Government in the formulation of financial policies that will stimulate agricultural and industrial production.

UNITED STATES CHEMICAL INDUSTRY FIGHTS TRUMAN PLAN TO MAKE IMPORTS CHEAPER AND GETS SUPPORT FROM MILITARY MEN

(By W. C. Bryant)

WASHINGTON.—The United States chemical industry is fighting an administration scheme to cut off much of its tariff protection.

Shortly after World War I, Congress granted this industry special tariff treatment. It was intended to encourage domestic production of chemicals like dyes and explosives that used to come from Germany.

Now, the Treasury, with State Department backing, wants a change in these laws. This proposal is part of "the Customs Simplification Act of 1950," a bill President Truman will soon send to Congress for its approval. The measure is supposed to reform customs procedures so importing all sorts of goods—not just chemicals—will be easier and cheaper.

Sections worrying chemical companies mainly affect coal-tar products, a vital segment of the industry. They now include not only dyes and explosives, but also plastics, insecticides, medical supplies, perfumes, and flavors.

WOULD CHANGE TARIFF BASE

Under present tariff law, duties on these imported chemicals are a percentage of the generally higher selling prices of American manufacturers. Duties on most other products are computed on the foreigners' selling prices. The new bill would give the chemical industry new tariff rates on competitive foreign items and apply them to the foreign, rather than domestic, selling prices. Initially, the new rates would be calculated to give about the same protection the industry now gets. But chemical companies see many failings in this change. They suspect it is part of a broader scheme to cut tariffs generally and permit more foreign competition.

A representative of the Monsanto Chemical Co. recalls that when the chemists first heard about the customs bill "the reaction was explosive."

A spokesman for the Manufacturing Chemist Association claims the change would be especially hard on some of the Nation's 46 dye-making outfits. It also would discourage companies from developing new chemicals, he thinks.

The industry is having some success in its battle to let the law stand as it is. The Tariff Commission has sent a "confidential" report to the Budget Bureau finding fault with the "chemical" part of the bill. Military planners, always worried about having enough domestic chemical production in time of war, have told Budget Bureau officials the change might do harm. Chemical men hope the Munitions Board will submit an even stronger report.

BILL HELD UP 2 MONTHS

With such help, they're trying to induce President Truman to delete the controversial sections from the customs bill before it goes to Congress.

Because of doubts the chemical industry has raised, the customs bill has been held up for over 2 months at the Budget Bureau, which supervises all legislation suggested by Federal agencies. This delay means Congress probably won't get around to acting on the bill until next year.

But despite all the optimistic signs, industry people think they'll have a tough time proving they still need special tariff protection to the satisfaction of the State and Treasury Departments.

Officials of these two agencies think the law should be changed for these two reasons:

Under the present scheme, the foreign exporter and the United States importer can't be sure what duty will be levied on a shipment. That's because the duty will depend largely on whether some United States firm is offering a similar chemical for sale when it is imported.

Second, the use of the "American selling price" is contrary to the rules of the proposed International Trade Organization. Though Congress hasn't okayed the ITO charter, it's on President Truman's legislative must list. It aims to improve trading conditions among some 50 countries.

PRESENT LAW HELPS UNITED STATES FIRMS

The chemical industry admits that the present law gives it advantages. It is the only major industry that knows any time it raises its prices, it also automatically makes higher tariff walls for foreign competition.

The law was intended to give advantages to United States producers. It sets up duties as a percentage of the value of the imported goods. In the case of most imports, the value is the foreign price. But whenever any foreign coal-tar product competes with the domestic item, the value is the American's selling price.

For instance, the price of a special dye may be about $1.20 a pound in Switzerland and about $1.50 in this country. If the duty, which is 40 percent, were based on the foreign price, it would be 48 cents, but using the American price makes it 60 cents.

For every dollar that the domestic price goes up, the import wall goes up 40 cents. This may not keep out all foreign competition, but it is more protection than most other industries have.

The law helps the United States companies in another important way, too. Whenever they decide to duplicate a foreign innovation, they know the tariff will go up as soon as they succeed and put a competing, domestic copy on the market.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS SPECIAL

Even if the foreign chemical isn't competitive, as long as it's a coal-tar product it is subject to special duties. In this case, the duty is based on the United States value, which is the prevailing price at which it sells in this country. Duty on most products is based on the foreign price, which is usually lower.

The customs bill proposes two major changes in the present law. First, the Tariff Commission would list all foreign coal-tar products that would compete with United States chemicals. It would figure out new tariff rates for these items, based on foreign prices. They would be calculated to give domestic firms about the same protection as they now get.

For example, some dyes, now taxed at 40 percent of the American selling price, would have a rate of about 100 percent of the foreign price. A few coal-tar products could even have rates of about 500 percent, experts roughly figured.

Although that still sounds like a lot of protection, United States companies say it isn't enough. For one thing, foreign producers could lower the tariff by cutting their prices. Thus, United States producers would no longer control the tariff wall. There would be no extra protection, either, for new products.

BUDGET BUREAU SUGGESTS COMPROMISE

The second change would be to base duties on noncompetitive items on the foreign price, instead of United States value. The present percentage rate would continue to apply on these chemicals.

To placate the chemists, the Budget Bureau suggested a compromise late last week. It involves having two rates for every coal-tar product: A high one to be used when customs officials think an import is competitive and a low one if it isn't. The Treasury would give 30-day notice before shifting from one rate to the other.

The Treasury may adopt this idea, but few disputants like it. The State Department thinks it might be too effective in keeping out imports. Industry representatives think it might not be effective enough. So the battle goes on.

A few other industries also would be affected by these changes. They produce rubber overshoes, knit gloves, and canned crab meat.

The chemical industry has one other tariff headache. The State Department last week listed a lot of imported chemicals on which it would like to cut the United States duty at a big trade parley to be held in England in September. The companies will get a chance to object to these proposed rate cuts in public hearings to be held next month.

OIL IMPORTS COSTING JOBS, MINERS SAY

Spokesmen for coal miners and operators urged Congress yesterday to curb oil imports, which they said are causing thousands of American workers to lose their jobs.

D. T. Buckley, of the National Coal Association, and Thomas Kennedy, vice president of the United Mine Workers, protested at a Senate Labor subcommittee hearing that foreign oil is being dumped in this country at unfair prices.

"The equivalent of a year's work for 50,000 miners in the bituminous coal industry is being destroyed by foreign oil at the current rate of importation," Buckley said.

Kennedy said that 100,000,000 barrels of residual oil—that is, oil used for fuel or industrial purposes—was imported last year and either put 25,000 coal miners out of work or reduced their workweek. He said the oil was marketed "at ridiculously low prices."

Buckley estimated last year's oil imports cost 25,000 miners and 25,000 transport workers their jobs, and said these figures could be doubled in 1950 if the present trend continues.

They testified at the opening of the subcommittee's hearing on a resolution by Senator NEELY (Democrat, West Virginia), to investigate the causes of "increasing unemployment" in the coal, railroad, oil, zinc, lead, and silver industries.

Kennedy said that if the present flow of imported oil increases, "as the prospect seems to indicate, we shall witness a complete disrupting and revamping of our American fuel pattern."

LOSS OF TEXTILE JOBS LAID TO DEVALUATION

NEW YORK, May 22.—American cotton textile men say their export trade has dropped more than $500,000,000 as a result of devaluation of foreign currencies and increased low-cost foreign competition.

This sum, they add, is equivalent to 52,000 American textile jobs and millions of wage dollars.

They compiled the figure in a battle against any further reduction of tariffs, claiming levies already have been slashed at least a third since 1935 and some items have been hit by 75 percent cuts.

The American Cotton Manufacturers Institute, Inc., the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, the Association of Cotton Textile Merchants of New York, and the Textile Export Association of the United States joined in preparing the brief for coming tariff hearings.

They have filed a survey of their views with the Committee for Reciprocity Information in Washington. Their testimony will be presented at committee hearings for consideration in tariff negotiations in England in September.

As the textile men prepared their brief, United States Department of Commerce figures showed that exports of cotton cloth from the United States in the first quarter were 120,740,000 square yards, a decline of 57.5 percent from the first quarter of 1949.

APPLE PRODUCERS ASK IMPORT LIMIT—CANADIAN COMPETITION HELD ADVERSE FACTOR ON DOMESTIC PRODUCT

WASHINGTON, June 5.—Apple producers today asked the Government to negotiate a 1,000,000-bushel import limitation on Canadian fresh apple imports when reciprocal trade agreements talks are resumed this fall.

But they left the door open for any other solution Government negotiations might work out to place this country's apple producers on an equal footing with Canadian producers, not only in trade among themselves but in foreign markets.

The quota limitation was proposed to the agricultural panel of the committee for reciprocity information by Frank W. Taylor, secretary of the Northwest Horticultural Council. It was approved by Truman Nold, executive secretary of the National Apple Institute.

MARKETS LOST IN WAR

Samuel Fraser, secretary of the International Apple Association, pushed for worldwide equality for American producers as the only chance for this country to regain war-lost European export markets. He said Europe's efforts to increase its apple output are complicating the situation. C. C. Rathbun, representing the Florida Canners Association, was the only other witness appearing today. He asked the committee to consider binding present tariffs on canned citrus juices. The general reduction on canned lime juice, he said, worked a hardship on the American industry, and any further reduction for any canned citrus juice would be felt here.

Taylor said the Oregon-Washington apple producers are affected most adversely by Canadian competition, and pointed out that apples imported from Canada carry only a 12½-cent-a-bushel duty while those moving from here to Canada must pay about 40 cents.

CANADIAN COSTS LOWER

In contrast, he said, Canadian production costs are about 60 cents a bushel below costs in the Pacific Northwest. This, coupled with a monopoly marketing system in British Columbia, makes it possible for Canada to undersell domestic producers and drive prices well below cost of production.

He said the council reluctantly advised the committee to place a quantitative restriction on Canadian apple imports, but added that exhaustive investigation failed to produce any other method of correcting the situation.

He also warned the committee that apples must be placed on the next supplemental list of commodities under negotiation at the coming trade talks or the United States would be unable to put apples on the agenda.

PRESERVERS OPPOSE CUTS

The New York Preservers' Association, Inc., went on record in opposition to any reduction in import duties on jams and jellies made from tree fruits and on orange marmalade.

While it is true that in the past the percentage of imports of jams, jellies, preserves, and marmalades has been comparatively small, the association brief said, "nevertheless any prospective reduction in the tariff on these items will constitute a serious threat to the industry, particularly in the New York area."

Most of these imports, the preservers held, coming principally from the United Kingdom, Cuba, and Canada, come into the port of New York, with the greater part of their sale concentrated here. An informal survey locally, the association said, revealed that the larger retail outlets in New York, mostly department stores and supermarkets, are giving considerable display space to imported preserves even exceeding the space devoted to the domestic products, and that very substantial quantities of foreign-made preserves and marmalades are being sold.

UNITED STATES POLICY SCORED ON CANDY TARIFF—CHAPMAN TELLS ASSOCIATION PARLEY CLOSING OF DOLLAR GAP IMPERILS INDUSTRY HERE

Sharp criticism of encouraging imports at the expense of home industries was made yesterday by Harry R. Chapman, chairman of the Washington committee of the National Confectioners' Association, at the association's annual meeting in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

"At the insistence of our own Government officials, Britain and other countries have agreed to exclude exports from the United States, while at the same time stepping up the shipment of their products to our markets," he declared. "This is called closing the dollar gap, but at the same time it would distribute poverty to American industries."

Mr. Chapman, who is also chairman of the board of the New England Confectionery Co., Cambridge, Mass., charged that 80,000 American workers in the candy industry alone have been made expendable as a result of this "strange doctrine."

He pointed out that the 40-percent duty on imported candy was reduced to 20 percent in 1939, to 14 percent in 1948, and now discussions are being held to recommend further cuts.

As an example of increased foreign competition, he said that during the first 2 months this year foreign candy imports increased 350 percent, with Czechoslovakia, a Soviet satellite, the second largest shipper. He said that these facts have been reported to the Tariff Commission.

MEAD ISSUES WARNING

James M. Mead, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, emphatically denied at the morning session that trade-practice rules may be used to cover up law violations.

"Should the Commission find any industry attempting such a practice," he said, "I can assure you that the full weight of the Commission's formal corrective powers would be speedily brought to bear against the guilty parties, and the rules for that industry would be rescinded."

The return of penny candy was reported by Philip P. Gott, president of the association. He explained that during the war manufacturers were reluctant to use limited sugar supplies for low-priced candies, but now the increase of young children has high-volume sales possibilities.

NEW MONTHLY IMPORT HIGHS LOOM IN FALL

(By E. M. Doran)

American imports are continuing the sharp upward climb they began in May. Now all-time monthly highs may be expected this fall.

Leading New York city banks which reported very sharp gains in total of letters of credit issued during July, yesterday indicated further expansion had occurred in August. Sensational gains over August 1949 were reported by some banks.

RISE IN IMPORT CREDITS

While a large volume of American imports is financed on terms other than letters of credit, the latter type of financing is relied on heavily. This reliance is sufficiently large that a sharp increase in the import letters of credit totals normally will be followed by a marked rise in total imports.

Letters of credit in payment for foreign merchandise may be taken out well in advance of shipment or at time of sale. But bankers report most credits are issued when an order is finally placed or when sales are made.

In some instances goods are prepared for shipment after the letter of credit has been established while in other cases goods may be ready for sale at time the credit is issued.

RISE REFLECTED LATER

Increases in imports as reported by the Bureau of Census, United States Department of Commerce, may show up in many cases within 1 to 3 months of when the banks here issue the credits. The large credit totals reported for August may be reflected largely in September and also in October or possibly November.

Import statistics have shown a steady upward trend in the past few months. In July, the last month for which official figures are available, imports passed the $711,000,000 mark. This compared with a 1949 monthly average of around $552,000,000 and with an all-time high of $720,000,000 chalked up in December 1948, when strike-delayed clearances swelled the total.

Leading New York City banks with whom the Journal of Commerce checked yesterday, stated that the values of import letters of credit issued in August showed gains ranging from 15 to 40 percent above July, in which month the total values reported were from 10 to 30 percent above earlier months.

SOME GAINS SPECTACULAR

Spectacular gains over August 1949 were reported in some instances with last August totals as much as 80 percent or more above the values in the preceding year.

The rise over August 1949 is significant also since the influx of Christmas goods which arrive in volume in early fall generally may be expected to swell credits issued in August.

REFLECT SPECIAL FACTORS

Banks with whom the writer checked pointed out that the sensational gains experienced in the value of credits established reflect a number of special factors. For example, heavy buying of foreign soda ash abroad was spurred by strikes here.

In a number of instances importers here are trying to build up inventories to higher levels on account of the unsettled international situation.

Accordingly, they now may be purchasing at a considerably higher rate than they may do in a few months. Further, the high prices for raw materials naturally swell import values.

MAY LEVEL OFF LATER

Factors such as these may mean that the steady upward trend in credits issued will level off later on, it was pointed out. On the other hand, the high totals reported currently as well as for August point to an extremely high level of imports throughout the remainder of the year.

Banks also foresee expansion in coming months of export letters of credit due to relaxation of foreign country import restrictions. This increase will be contingent on United States ability to supply merchandise wanted in midst of accelerating defense efforts.

Every dollar rise in imports, whether gained fortuitously such as in the case of products sold here because of American strikes, or otherwise, expands foreign purchasing power. This, in turn, it is noted, generally makes for further relaxation of import controls abroad and promises to help sustain foreign demand for American goods over the long run.

Poland and Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Secretary of Labor, Maurice J. Tobin, over radio station WSPR, in Springfield, Mass. Secretary Tobin spoke on the Justice for Poland radio program. His pertinent and forthright statement of our country's position in opposition to atheistic communism, which has engulfed the freedom-loving people of Poland, is worthy of commendation. It is the prayer of the American people that Poland will soon be free of its bonds of atheistic communism, and that the people will gain the independence which they have so long cherished.

POLAND AND FREEDOM

It is more than 7 months since I spoke on this Justice for Poland program. I talked at that time about the sad plight of trade unions in countries behind the iron curtain.

Events have marched rapidly since then. Communism has grown more violently aggressive, and the forces of freedom have mobilized spiritual and economic strength more powerfully to defend liberty and democracy.

As President Truman has said on July 19 in his message to Congress on Korea:

"The American people are united in their belief in democratic freedom. We are united in detesting Communist slavery.

"We know that the cost of freedom is high. But we are determined to preserve our freedom, no matter what the cost.

"I know that our people are willing to do their part to support our soldiers and sailors and airmen who are fighting in Korea. I know that our fighting men can count on each and every one of you.

"Our country stands before the world as an example of how free men, under God, can build a community of neighbors, working together for the good of all.

"That is the goal we seek not only for ourselves, but for all people. We believe that freedom and peace are essential if men are to live as our Creator intended us to live. It is this faith that has guided us in the past, and it is this faith that will fortify us in the stern days ahead."

We are arising to the height of the ethical challenge of the hour. That challenge calls for a patriotism as big and precious as our country's very survival. I do not doubt that this call will be answered nobly by most Americans. I know it will be so answered by American labor which has always fought, as Samuel Gompers said 26 years ago, to abolish wrong and establish right, for itself and for the children of men everywhere.

For Poland and for the other countries behind the iron curtain, we can offer our prayers and our own example, to help in the fight of the people against communistic dictatorship.

In Poland, for example, the Communist totalitarian repression increases at the expense of the freedom of the working people. I have before me a new edict, a law dated April 19 1950, Journal of Laws No. 20, which is the latest step of Poland's rulers to oppress the freedom-loving workers of that country.

This law, in its preamble, trumpets the rights of the working class as masters. In its second breath, however, the preamble bodes ill to those who would be so foolhardy as to reduce the effectiveness of the devoted work of their colleagues and hamper the steady increase in prosperity and culture for the working masses by violating work discipline. The law says that every manual or white-collar worker, irrespective of his position and the type of work performed by him, who is employed in a nationalized establishment, institution or office, should be held responsible "in the event of unjustified absenteeism" for violation of work discipline. According to the law, the council of ministers will determine the cases of absence from work which require justification, as well as the procedure with regard to proving justification for absence from work. It may be presumed from this that any worker who was ill and who did not secure the services of an approved physician could not justify his absence. The law goes even further in stating that a person who is absent from work for a part of a day in excess of the limits laid down by the ministers is considered absent for the whole day. This is indeed a far cry from our working standards in which persons are allowed annual vacations and sick leave on their own statements.

In an apparent attempt to soften this decree, the Communist rulers of Poland have decided that any worker, who distinguishes himself by "irreproachable work discipline" for a period of 3 years should be recommended for state decoration and prizes.

Let us look at the penalties in this Communist decree. For the first breach of discipline a worker is given a rebuke with warning or fined the equivalent of 1 day's pay. Should the worker be so rash as to be absent without excuse for 3 days or for a third time in any one calendar year, then the fine jumps to 2 days' pay for each day absent, or a good chance of demotion to lower paid work. Then if a worker should be absent for a period of 4 days in a row or 4 days in any one calendar year, he is subject to court penalty. This court penalty will oblige him to remain at the same job for a period not exceeding 3 months with a cut in pay of 10 to 25 percent. All of these penalties apply in a country where a worker cannot arbitrarily select a day of vacation and have it apply against his annual vacation time. These penalties are imposed in a country where the minimum workweek is 6 days and the minimum workday 8 hours. Such minimums, of course, can well be disregarded if a factory should fail to meet its production quota for the month.

Not to be outdone with severe penalties for workers, the decree also provides punishment for managers if they become lenient in such matters. The law says, "The manager of a work establishment who, intentionally and contrary to the circumstances, considers the absence of a worker as justified or, in spite of the obligation imposed upon him, does not inflict a penalty or does not submit the case to court is liable to imprisonment up to 3 months or a fine up to 150,000 zlotys, or to both of these punishments." The fine is the equivalent of 4½ months' wages. I can well imagine the results of such a law in this country. Yet this is supposed to be an example of production and progress under the Communist domination.

Under such rules and edicts the freedom of individuals has no meaning. Polish workmen will soon realize that the state's view that their sole purpose in life is production, that they will be allowed only enough rest as to enable them to produce more, and that severe and immediate penalties will be imposed if they should entertain the thought of taking a day off for rest or relaxation.

To further the Communist scheme, to build the machines and dig the coal, the people's democracy—that's what the Communist dictatorship is called—has decreed that labor unions shall exist; not representative unions whose purpose is to improve working conditions and raise living standards but organizations of work power which may be assigned goals in the Communist program. The unions do not serve as bargaining agents or grievance committees or even as contract negotiators. No; their single purpose is to provide ability, manpower, and another administrative control on the workers. Yes; a Polish workman is allowed to join the unions. If he doesn't join and make his services available to the production scheme, then he is in trouble. He may join the many millions of liberated people who work as forced labor for the Communists. During my last address to this group, I mentioned the forced-labor camps, and I want to do so again. I do not know the exact number of humans who are kept alive only so long as they are able to work. May God grant us the ability to help those who have become such victims of the Communist system.

This program is named "Justice for Poland." Only under God and free men can there be justice for Poland or for any other country. Although the Polish people continue to find strength and solace in a religion which suffers from constant attack by the government, the Communist regime, based on the shifting sands of materialism, tries its best to change the Polish people, to bend their knee at the Ikon of Sovietism.

The Poles have a long history of Christianity. They believe it and they practice it and they will never accept the state as their God. The people of Poland are still Christians, but their rulers are trying to substitute the state for God.

The new masters of Poland have decided that free religious activity has no place in the Communist scheme of things.

The people, the workers of Poland, have only their faith and friends in this country and the rest of the free world to depend on.

The mask has been stripped from the face of Communist aggression and underneath we find the grim countenance of Soviet imperialism.

This is the time to support the action of the United Nations.

This is the time when free men everywhere must pray and work together to release those who have fallen prey to Communist aggression and Communist repression behind the iron curtain.

Senator McCarthy's Charges Against State Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release for March 29, 1950, concerning my statement on Senator MCCARTHY'S charges against the State Department.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The people back home, the honest people who make up this land of ours, are amazed and a little confused at what is going on here in the Halls of Congress.

A United States Senator, Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, indicated he had reason to believe that traitor Alger Hiss was not the only person disloyal to the United States who had access to State Department secret files—that apparently there had been others who were poor security risks—and he asked that a complete study and investigation be made. The Senate authorized the investigation, and a subcommittee was appointed.

The news stories, giving blow-by-blow descriptions of the subcommittee's performance, indicate that an effort has been made to browbeat the Senator who asked for the investigation. The Senate's orders to the committee were "to conduct a full and complete study and investigation as to whether persons who are disloyal to the United States are or have been employed by the Department of State." The Senate, after listening to Senator MCCARTHY, decided an investigation of the State Department should be made, and ordered it. The Senate did not order its committee to investigate Senator MCCARTHY; he is not on trial. In its investigation of the State Department the subcommittee obviously could use Senator MCCARTHY'S information for leads. The Senate's orders to the subcommittee were not to try to whitewash Mr. Acheson's department, but to investigate—to find out if there are or have been persons in that Department who are selling or giving away this Government's secrets.

Naturally, any of those named as Communist sympathizers, or poor security risks, are going to call the charges untrue when appearing before the committee. What counts is the cross-examination. But there is no effective cross-examination.

What kind of an investigation is this?

There's a friendly pat on the back, a "proud of you" murmur, and applause from the audience.

I am reminded that Alger Hiss was applauded when he first appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee. But the House committee did no whitewashing of traitors, applause or no applause. Had the House Committee on Un-American Activities operated as our Senate subcommittee started out to operate, quite probably traitor Alger Hiss would still be calling the shots on our foreign policies, as he did at Yalta. You will recall that traitor Hiss was the top adviser to a very sick President at Yalta, and it was there that we gave Manchuria, the breadbasket of China, to the Russians. It was largely through that action that China was lost. With that President dead and Hiss convicted, we have no way of knowing at this time what other dangerous commitments were made upon traitor Hiss' promptings.

There was great glee when Miss Dorothy Kenyon, one of those named as a Communist sympathizer, called Senator MCCARTHY a liar, notwithstanding the fact that news articles had connected her name with a long list of front organizations branded as subversive, and notwithstanding the fact that Miss Kenyon's attitude toward the Alger Hiss matter was the same as that of the Communist Daily Worker—that "Alger Hiss is a perfect example of sacrifice to the hysteria created by the Un-American Activities Committee," to use her words.

Miss Kenyon received the kid-glove treatment from the Democratic majority of the committee who, though specifically directed to probe Red infiltration of the State Department, appear more interested in coddling and protecting persons whose connections give rise to serious doubts about their loyalty.

Ambassador-at-Large Philip C. Jessup seems a little worried now over the reputation of our State Department. Isn't he a little late with this concern? He should have thought of the reputation of the State Department when he, a high official of that Department, started association with persons such as A. A. Heller, Frederick V. Field, Howard Fast, and John Howard Larson. Jessup should have thought of the reputation of the State Department when he sponsored the American Russian Institute, cited by the Attorney General as un-American. He should have thought of this when he became a member of the advisory board of the American Law Students Association, an affiliate of the American League Against War and Fascism and the American Youth Congress, both cited as Communist-front organizations by the Attorney General. He should have thought of this when he became a member of the board of sponsors of the National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights, enthusiastically supported by the Communists and cited as subversive.

He should have thought of this when he got mixed up in the Institute of Pacific Relations with some of the same crowd who were running the magazine Amerasia. (You will recall that the offices of Amerasia were raided by the FBI and around 100 files of State, Treasury, Navy, and OSS documents were found—some vital; and you will recall that the case was suddenly hushed up, after one of those involved was fined.) Jessup should have thought of the State Department's reputation when he, as an official of that Department, testified that Alger Hiss' reputation for loyalty, integrity, and veracity "is good." Yes, it would seem Dr. Jessup is a little late with his great concern over the standing of the State Department.

Secretary Acheson himself had a nice word to say for traitor, Alger Hiss.

I, for one, have heard enough and read enough about the cases presented for study by Senator McCarthy to cause me to join in the demand for a thorough investigation—not a whitewash.

No wonder the people are amazed and a little confused: Committee hearing audiences applaud and headlines are made when those accused deny the charges, but an admission by a State Department official that 91 employees of that Department have been dismissed for being homosexuals passes with little excitement. I venture to say no such percentage of degenerates could be found in any other company of human beings. The American people are interested in knowing if others are still there.

The State Department gathers the data, formulates the plans, lays down the techniques, short of war, for foreign policy and the welfare of our country. Our foreign policy has been wrong for years. What part did those homosexuals, obviously subject to blackmail, play in the formulation and conduct of those erroneous policies?

Homosexuality has figured, off stage, in one of our traitorous operations. A great deal of the trouble we are in, internationally, can be laid to the tolerance of that kind of weakness in a service which should be above reproach.

Did homosexuals, bribed or bullied, help plan the ECA program? Did homosexuals decide that America must accept a greater volume of imports from abroad, even at the cost of injury to her own industry and unemployment to her own workingmen?

Mr. Acheson, in his speech about total diplomacy, demands that Americans commit their total resources, making adjustments here at home. The adjustments to which Mr. Acheson refers mean, it is presumed, that if American industries are damaged by his free-trade policy of importing an unprecedented volume of foreign cheap-labor products, we shall have to tax and tax ourselves to vote relief to ourselves. I wonder who it was in the State Department that thought that one up?

Obviously, the State Department needs a housecleaning from top to bottom. All Americans should be grateful to Senator McCarthy for pointing up the existence of a deplorable situation which now must be corrected—and should demand that a thorough investigation be made.

Jewish Festival of Tabernacles Reminds Americans That the "Four Freedoms" Are an Intellectual Heritage of the Old Testament

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following synopsis of a stirring sermon recently delivered by my good friend, Rabbi Edward E. Klein, rabbi of the Stephen Wise Free Synagogue, 30 West Sixty-eighth Street, New York. I believe that Rabbi Klein has a message here for all Americans.

Speaking at the Sabbath service of the Stephen Wise Free Synagogue, Rabbi Edward E. Klein pointed out that the Jewish Festival of Tabernacles is a reminder of the importance of the "four freedoms." He said, "Actually there is a close bond between our fathers—who proclaimed three millennia ago that it is immoral and ungodly for man to enslave his fellowman—and the embodiment of the ideal of freedom in the institutions of American democracy. The founding fathers of Judaism proclaimed the dignity and inviolability of the individual; and America's founding fathers took that vision and built it into a government based on the proposition that men are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights.

"Of all the rights most cherished through the years, the right of free speech was most precious. If Moses had not dared to speak out before Pharaoh, the Jewish people would have disappeared in the totalitarian world of old. If the prophets had permitted themselves to be throttled by priests and kings, the Judeo-Christian ideal would never have come into being. Faith in man as the child of God means faith in man's ability to solve his problems through the free give and take of ideas. For this wars were fought, men gave their life's blood, and to this the Government of the United States was dedicated.

"And yet, such are the tensions in this age of the cold war, such is the fear that grips us that in blind hysteria we strike at the foundations of the freedom which is our birthright.

"A so-called anti-Communist bill was recently passed over the stern veto of the President, a bill which the President warns 'can be the greatest danger to freedom of speech, press, and assembly since the alien and sedition laws of 1798.' Among such provisions as those which would set up American concentration camps and immigration barriers that would make the Statue of Liberty a mockery is one requiring the registration of Communist-front organizations. This defines such organizations as those which take positions 'from time to time on matters of policy which do not deviate from the Communist movement.' Think of it. Because the Communists hate Fascist Spain and we hate Fascist Spain, we might be tarred with the same brush. Because they favor rent controls and so do we, we might be suspect.

"Every sincere anti-Communist liberal, every patriot who holds an unpopular opinion, any zealous citizen who walks in the footsteps of Jefferson and Lincoln, might be in jeopardy. Must we resort to double think and double talk to protect our livelihoods and our families?

"I hate communism as thoroughly as do the authors of this bill. For the threat to world peace, communism is guilty. For warring on religion, communism is guilty. For the persecution of Zionists behind the iron curtain, communism is guilty. For spying and sabotage, communism is guilty. But we serve the Communists when out of fear we circumscribe liberties even as do the Russians. The security of the state is indissolubly bound up with the security of the individual. We weaken America when we weaken our liberties.

"Yes; we must legislate against espionage and sabotage and subversive action; but when we legislate against thought, we legislate against America. I like the words of Governor Dewey, 'We should prosecute men for the crimes they have committed, not for the ideas they have.'

"And yet hope must not be surrendered. God be praised, we live in a democracy whose growth and development are in the hands of the people. Mistakes can be rectified. A step back to reaction can be checked by steps forward to progress. We can all speak out even as our President has spoken out. Let us make our wishes known at the ballot box. Let us do our best to influence the climate of opinion around us. Let us not succumb to fear and panic. Let us believe in democracy and work at democratic living with such dedication that our enemies will be discredited and that America become the living inspiration of a struggling world. Let the symbolism of the Sukkoth remind us always of the freedoms which are our birthright as children of the ever-living God."

Bipartisan Foreign Policy Nonexistent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the Record a press release for April 25, 1950, giving my reasons for feeling the bipartisan foreign policy is nonexistent.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26.—"The bipartisan foreign policy, about which we hear so much, does not exist," United States Senator George W. Malone, Republican, Nevada, declared today in addressing his colleagues in the Senate. The Nevada Senator quoted from the Republican Party platform to show that the party's position was diametrically opposite to that of the Acheson-Lattimore-State Department policy which the Democratic Party has adopted.

"No one can be for the principles of the Republican Party and for the Democratic Party foreign policy at the same time," Senator MALONE said, "since the fundamental principles of the two parties are diametrically opposed. Bipartisan foreign policy, like reciprocal trade, is a catch phrase to sell the one-economic-world philosophy to the American people.

"The Executive, through the State Department, is supposed to formulate the foreign policies and then submit them to us for consideration and debate, and approval or rejection. The three branches of government were set up to form a system of 'checks and balances,' and any coalition is against the spirit of the Constitution. As operated now, the foreign policy is handed to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to accept, as is, without dotting an 'i' or crossing a 't'. However, when the State Department is being attacked from all sides for its miserable failure and for the questionable character of some of its officials, past and present, the President and the Secretary of State, and others, made uncomfortable by the disclosures, search frantically to find a way to share the blame; it is then they like the word bipartisan' as they plead, weakly, that those who expose the rottenness are attacking the 'bipartisan foreign policy.'

"The few Republican Senators who go along with the Acheson-Lattimore-State Department foreign policy cannot be said to represent the Republican viewpoint. As set forth in its statement of principles, the Republican Party believes that world trade, an integral part of foreign policy, should be developed on a basis of fair and reasonable competition and that 'products of underpaid foreign labor shall not be admitted to this country on terms which endanger the living standards of the American workingman and the American farmer, or threaten serious injury to domestic industry.' Republicans then are obviously against free trade.

"On the other hand, the Democrats are committed to the three-part free-trade program as outlined to the Senate Appropriations Committee by the Undersecretary of State, the program which includes the 1934 Trade Agreements Act, the ECA, and the International Trade Organization. The Democrats are for free trade—the lowering of tariffs and import fees to the point that competition of low-wage foreign goods and slave-labor products will remove the floor from under wages and investments in the country and reduce the standard of living of American workers. This is the State Department's foreign policy, and I submit that it cannot be bipartisan.

"The two opposing positions of the major parties are clear. A Senator can be on one side or the other; he cannot be on both sides. There cannot be a bipartisan foreign policy without a major change in the accepted platform of one of the major parties."

Who Runs America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to insert my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the New Era, an AFL publication at Reading, Pa.:

WHO RUNS AMERICA?

That's the question propounded by the American Medical Association in its campaign against national health insurance. It's an interesting question which the AMA proceeds to answer in this manner: "Running America is the joint job of 150,000,000 people."

Now up to this point we cannot quarrel with the AMA's statements which appear in their $1,200,000 advertising campaign hitting the Nation this week in newspapers and magazines—and on the radio. The AMA's logic beyond this point grows quite fuzzy and confused, however, and creates the impression that a scared animal produced the advertising copy while riding out a hurricane.

Who really does run America? Well, until the advent of the New Deal back in the Republican depression days, powerful employers with plenty of money to spend on elections, ran America. Our laws from the period prior to 1930 are evidence of this. Representatives in Congress served their masters well—and the masters were that small handful of men who controlled the Nation's greatest corporations, investment trusts, and international cartels.

Workers were emancipated from their industrial shackles in 1933 and during the past 17 years they have been slowly moving toward a more accurate realization of the fact that running America is the joint job of 150,000,000 people. Only in the last two decades have the 150,000,000 Americans begun to use their right to vote. Only in the past 20 years have they awakened to the cruel hoax which the money crowd of America was perpetrating in the name of democracy.

The AMA doesn't really want the common people of America to turn out at the polls en masse and send liberals to Congress. Not at all. If all the working people vote, they eventually will demand better medical care. The average working man or woman is the one who needs it most. And usually they are the ones who cannot afford it.

The logic of the AMA is indeed strange. In the first place, the AMA calls national health insurance socialized medicine. That phrase "socialized medicine" is supposed to conjure up all the evil spirits known to man and thus create a scare atmosphere in which the AMA propaganda can work.

National health insurance is not socialized medicine and the AMA knows darned well it isn't. Doctors would not be compelled to accept patients and patients could choose their doctors. The Government would not tell doctors how to diagnose and treat illness. Workers would contribute to their own medical care through a small weekly payroll deduction of approximately $1 per week per family—just as they now do to provide social security when they reach age 65 and no longer can be gainfully employed.

National health insurance is simply a method of paying for medical care in advance. To date no one has explained how this differs from Blue Cross or Blue Shield. For some strange reason, the AMA does not object when its members are paid by these private agencies. Yet they holler like blazes and cry "socialism" when the Government suggests that we extend social security to cover medical care for all of the people. Don't forget, national health insurance can come into being only by majority action of the Congress of the United States which represents those 150,000,000 Americans the AMA speaks of. And we always were taught that that's democracy.

The AMA, in our opinion, is missing the boat in its advertising campaign. "An American's heritage is the right to learn the facts," says the AMA. We defy anyone to show us anywhere in the AMA ad a single analysis of the national health insurance bill. Instead of discussing the facts, the AMA deals in trick words like "state socialism" and "socialized medicine."

We make no pretenses about crystal ball gazing, but if we were to venture a prediction, it is this: The AMA campaign will send millions of Americans in search of the real facts. And when those Americans get the facts, the AMA is really going to learn who runs America.

Government Offices Need Cleaning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release of May 10, 1950, giving my views on the immediate housecleaning need in Government jobs.

There being no objection the remarks were ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, said today in the Senate that there must be an immediate housecleaning of poor security risks in Government jobs, and that it was senseless to try to measure loyalty by degrees, as the administration is doing in differentiating between those classed as disloyal to America and those Government employees classed as poor security risks.

Senator MALONE demanded that action be taken on this bill, S. 3213, for the creation of a Loyalty Review Board as an independent establishment of the Federal Government, the members of which would be approved by the Senate. The Nevada Senator said that the present board, scattered over the world from Hawaii to New York, seldom if ever meet together, that its office staff, as a matter of course, approves the findings of the lower loyalty boards. Poor security risks are still in important Government posts here in Washington, the Senator said, and his bill would be in the interest of security of the Nation.

Continuing, Senator MALONE said: "President Truman is reported to have made a broad statement in a recent speech intended to give the impression that there were no subversives in the Government service. One wonders if the President would not have made the same statement had traitor Alger Hiss—or some of the other subsequently exposed subversives—still been on the Government payroll. As a matter of fact, did not President Truman refer to the congressional investigation of Hiss as a 'red herring' shortly before he was proved to be a traitor.

"Although the President's Loyalty Review Board includes some men of fine character, I regret to say that the Board itself is not above reproach. I am reliably informed, and there is documentary evidence to back it up, that one William Ludwig Ullman, in applying for a Government post, gave the name of Harry W. Blair, lawyer, Tower Building, Washington, D. C., as his personal reference.

Later, Ullman was accused of being a member of the espionage group which conveyed information from the files of the State Department here to agents of the Soviet Union, and when Ullman was subpenaed and asked questions pertaining to these charges he refused to answer on the ground of self-incrimination. Harry W. Blair, who is one of Ullman's sponsors, is a member of the President's Loyalty Review Board.

"There is no denying that the President's Loyalty Review Board has cleared persons subsequently found to be poor security risks. To illustrate: A Mr. Jesse Eppstein, an admitted member of the professional unit of the Communist Party in Seattle, Wash., was cleared by the loyalty review board of the Federal Public Housing Authority and the President's Loyalty Review Board approved that clearance. The man known in the Commerce Department as Michael J. Lee, whose real name is Ephraim Lieberman, who was once refused American citizenship on the ground that he was not attached to principles of Constitution of United States, was cleared and is still Chief of the Far Eastern Division of our Office of International Trade. I am told that William Remington, who admitted to cooperating with Elizabeth T. Bentley, a confessed Soviet spy, was cleared by the present Board and is now in the Department of Commerce, but transferred to a job where it is considered safe to work.

"While thousands of loyal American citizens are out of work, we have the spectacle here in Washington of administration officials going far out of their way to find a place for one they admit is a poor security risk. Mr. C. V. Whitney, on the occasion of his resignation as Under Secretary of Commerce, said it is 'eyewash' to think Government workers classed as poor security risks can simply be transferred to 'less sensitive jobs.'

"The Loyalty Review Board as provided for in my bill would correct the present situation. The American people are interested in loyalty to America of their employees in Washington."

Ghosts in Philadelphia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, pursuant to the general order entered into September 23, I ask leave to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Ghosts in Philadelphia" which was published in the September issue of the News Letter of the Supreme Council, Thirty-third Degree, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, for the northern Masonic jurisdiction, United States of America. The article, written by Mr. McIlyar H. Lichliter, editor of the News Letter, presents a graphic picture of Philadelphia in 1776 and the historic events which culminated in the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. It was greatly appreciated by all who attended the annual meeting of the supreme council held in the city of Philadelphia, September 27.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GHOSTS IN PHILADELPHIA

(By McIlyar H. Lichliter)

Philadelphia is one large city in these United States where one may see ghosts. In Boston, they have been driven from Beacon Hill and exorcised from the vicinage of the Old North Church—by whom, we do not here reveal. They still linger in Plymouth and Salem, in Harvard Yard, and in the classic shades of Lexington and Concord. But they throng downtown Philadelphia, especially along Chestnut Street between the Benjamin Franklin Hotel and Independence Hall. The harmless phantoms on their errands glide, with feet that make no sound upon the floor.

Fifty-six in all—a colorful crowd. Men with powdered wigs, knee breeches, silken hose, silver buckles, shirts with lace and ruffles, coats and waistcoats of brilliant hues. There were also the Friends, "the people called Quakers," in sober homespun, dark hair, and broad-brim hats—the most successful business and professional men in town. The leaders of the Colonies have come together to form a Continental Congress and to decide the destiny of a new Nation. They crowded the London Coffee House, at the southwest corner of Front and Market, the City Tavern, on Second Street above Walnut, and available rooms in private homes. They met in various places—the long room of the City Tavern, seating 300, in the State House—and in Carpenter's Hall. Philadelphia: 1774–76. Population 20,000. Three thousand houses. Larger than New York.

John Dickinson, perhaps the most eminent leader, who was to hold the Congress in the hollow of his hands until the tide turned, lived outside the city at his beautiful estate, Fairhill. Wealthy, cultured, a man of unblemished integrity, a scholar in the law, trained in Middle Temple, London, a persuasive speaker and the author of the most influential political pamphlet of the day, Letters From a Farmer in Pennsylvania. There's a dramatic touch. Isaac Norris, whose daughter Mary married John Dickinson, was speaker of the Provincial Assembly for 31 years and chose the inscription for the great bell ordered from London, "Proclaim liberty throughout the land, to all the inhabitants thereof." (Leviticus 25: 10.) He never dreamed what that was to mean.

John Dickinson led the conservatives, opposing separation from Great Britain as valiantly as he resisted British aggression. Was not Massachusetts too precipitous? Why not pay the East India Co. for the tea dumped into the harbor, open the ports, get the ships moving again—and wait? Some of the most powerful friends of the Colonies were in Parliament, he said—and that was true.

John Adams, of Massachusetts, with the strong support of Benjamin Franklin and the Virginians, was the foremost advocate of complete separation from Great Britain. The debate was impassioned, then became quiescent—while the Congress elected Washington as Commander in Chief and tried to finance armed resistance which had already begun. What ghosts there are at Valley Forge. In 1776, the debate flared up again and became bitter. One day, on Chestnut Street, John Adams removed his hat and bowed to John Dickinson, but Dickinson passed him on the street with a face of stone.

The tide turned toward independence. On June 7, 1776, the brilliant Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, moved "That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." A month of solemn discussion—the story ought to thrill every American heart. These men knew what it would cost, and they were not afraid. At the last—a vote. Delaware proudly recalls how Caesar Rodney rode all night from Dover, Del., 80 miles, through a driving rain, and reached the State House covered with mud and intolerably weary, just in time to cast a decisive vote. That was July 2.

Last scene: John Adams, as great in humility as in wisdom, said to a lanky reddish-haired Virginian—one Thomas Jefferson: "I am obnoxious, suspected, and unpopular. You are much otherwise and you can write better than I." Climb the stairs to a hot second-floor room at Mr. Graf's on Market Street, see Jefferson, desk-board on knee, quill pen in hand, slowly composing the immortal Declaration. Franklin, who like Washington and Jefferson did not care for speeches but was a master of words, sat by him and helped him with certain phrases. On July 4, 1776, the Declaration of Independence witnessed the birth of a new nation. The city was wild with joy, and, as one historian writes, the Liberty Bell "was heard in heaven."

A final word: One sentence cut from Jefferson's draft has a nostalgic touch for the chaotic days in which we live. Speaking of the true Britain and the British people, he had written, "We might have been a great and free people—together." Is it too late?

Unnecessary Fault in Highway Systems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my May 26, 1950, press release on the unnecessary and stupid fault in one of our transcontinental highway systems.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, today demanded that immediate action be taken to correct what he called an "unnecessary and stupid fault in one of our transcontinental highway systems." In a strong statement to the Senate Public Works Committee, of which he is a member, Senator MALONE called attention to the 47-mile gap of unimproved road in western Utah which prevents highway No. 6 from extending unbroken 3,000 miles from Provincetown, Mass., to Long Beach, Calif.

After completing his statement before the committee, Senator MALONE said that he believed this Congress will correct the situation, which he referred to as deplorable. "The 47-mile link of unimproved road should not be permitted to interfere with the efficient use of a 3,000 mile transcontinental highway," the Senator said, continuing: "The completion of this link is important to national defense, as highway No. 40 is now the only complete transcontinental highway through the central part of the Nation and in the event of an emergency both routes would be vital."

In Senator MALONE's presentation to the committee, it was developed that in conference with the Federal Director of Public Roads, Thomas H. McDonald, and the Highway Commission of Utah, the Utah commission will set aside 27 percent, or $202,500, of the needed $750,000 for the completion of this link in highway No. 6 when the Federal Government makes available its 73 percent, or $547,500, under the provisions of the Federal Aid Act. It was also developed that if the Federal Government would act immediately, the 47-mile link could be completed by the end of 1951.

Senator MALONE told the committee that although an amendment had been offered to authorize the necessary funds, the amendment may not be necessary, that a way may be found to do the work without passage of the amendment.

Civic organizations in five States, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, Nevada and California, have been in consultation with Senator MALONE in regard to the completion of the vital link in the transcontinental highway.

Address of Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, at Clarksburg, W. Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, pursuant to the general order entered into September 23, I ask leave to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by me at a Republican rally held at Clarksburg, W. Va., October 18, 1950.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am very happy to be here tonight because West Virginia is a stronghold of loyalty and patriotic Americanism.

For many years I have derived a great deal of pleasure from my frequent social, business, and political visits to your State. I am grateful for the warm, neighborly welcome I have always received.

I want to assure you also that Pennsylvania is proud of the greatness of West Virginia and its important place in the economic life of the United States. Your vast natural resources, your mineral wealth, your great reserves of coal, your gas and oil production—all form a solid base on which your people have built their splendid cultural and spiritual progress.

Your diversified industries, iron and steel, chemicals, glass, pottery, textiles, leather, and tobacco products, to name but a few, have developed West Virginia into one of the great workshops of the world. They have contributed to the welfare and prosperity of the whole Nation. Your agriculture has become increasingly important, particularly in livestock and livestock products.

Yes—Pennsylvania is proud of the Mountain State—proud of its historic tradition as the home of free men and women who know the meaning of real Americanism. We are proud of West Virginia because your people have given the world an example of love of liberty, loyalty to the Union in the dark days of national crisis, faith in the American Republic and faith in God.

It was upon faith in God and faith in the capacity of a free people to govern themselves that our Nation was established. Firm reliance on the protection of divine providence is solemnly expressed in the immortal charter of American freedom, the Declaration of Independence.

In the Constitutional Convention of 1787 Benjamin Franklin reminded his colleagues that "God governs in the affairs of men" when he proposed that daily prayers be held "imploring the assistance of heaven and its blessings upon our deliberations."

The founding fathers recognized freedom under God as the foundation of all human progress.

The pioneers of our independence sought guidance in the teachings of the Holy Bible. The greatness of the United States reflects the deep religious conviction of our people, their love of God, their ardent desire to live in peace, good will, and tolerance. It reflects their self-reliance, their willingness to work and save, and to create through their own toil and sacrifice a better land and a better life for themselves and their children.

American diplomatic leadership in the world was the product of many generations of honesty and fair dealing with other countries, constant striving for peace, and unselfish zeal for justice and freedom for all people.

Those, in brief outline, are the principles of Americanism. Under our system of government freedom of the individual reached its highest peak in all world history.

My fellow Americans, all of us who love our country, Republicans and Democrats alike, know that the freedoms which have come down to us from the patriotism and the sacrifice of our forefathers are in grave danger.

We all know that we are engaged in a desperate struggle for survival as a free nation.

What has happened during the 5 years since our glorious victory in World War II?

We were then the greatest military power of all time. Our great military leaders and fighting men had placed us at the pinnacle of world affairs. The freedom-loving people of every nation looked to America to lead them in the ways of peace.

But just 5 years later, instead of cultivating the garden of peace, we are again called upon to use force and spill American blood on foreign soil.

We are again engaged in conflict which may destroy even our own freedom.

Who is to blame for the situation that has been brought upon us?

Who has been in power and responsible for our diplomatic policies?

Was the Republican Party? Was the Republican Party represented at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam?

Was the Republican Party consulted about the secret agreements entered into at those conferences?

You know the answers. It was a Democratic President and his Democratic Department of State that sold out one nation after another in Europe and Asia and placed millions of people in bondage behind the iron curtain.

It was the Truman administration that announced to the world that we had abandoned the defense of Korea and Formosa and thus gave the Communists a free ticket to overrun South Korea at will. Then, overnight, without any preparation, without trained men, without adequate equipment, Mr. Truman announced that we were going to defend South Korea.

Were the Republicans consulted in framing the policy that led up to the crisis in Korea? Not a single Republican had a thing to do with it, even though the administration talks about a bipartisan policy. The blundering of the Democratic administration is directly and completely responsible for the situation in which we find ourselves.

And today more than 30,000 American casualties have been announced so far and the list is still growing.

Had the administration leaders taken a strong, firm, determined stand, had they made it known months in advance that the United States would resist aggression, we would not be reading the casualty lists today.

The Truman administration must be held responsible for every life that was sacrificed, for every wounded boy up to this day and the days to come before this conflict ends.

We are all fully aware that the end of the shooting war in Korea will not mean that peace has returned to the world.

Victory in Korea must not erase from our minds the greater danger that we may be plunged into total war to defend our very existence against the threat of world conquest by the Godless forces of communism.

How can we build American strength to meet the crisis into which we have been forced?

We want a United States so powerful that no aggressor nation will dare disturb the peace of the world.

But, first, let us have a clear understanding of what we mean when we say we want a strong America.

America will be strong only if we defend our own individual liberty against the creeping paralysis of socialism and its poisonous promise of an easy way of life at the expense of the Government.

We must remember that unless we preserve our own freedom here at home we will be powerless to bring freedom to any other country in the world.

America will be strong only if we build our spiritual and moral resources in a great mobilization of righteousness.

We must defend America against greed, selfishness, and grasping ambition for personal advantage. With the spirit of God in our hearts, we should clean up all immoral practices in politics, and business, and in national and international affairs.

America will be strong only as we strive to restore solvency to our Nation—to meet the costs of war on a pay-as-you-go basis—and to abandon the policy of reckless and extravagant spending which has already brought us to the brink of national bankruptcy.

America will be strong only if every citizen, in every walk of life, recognizes his individual responsibility for the future of our country and does his full duty in peace and war.

Furthermore, and most important, America will be strong only if those in control of the Government set an example of honesty and morality in the conduct of national and international affairs.

One of the great tragedies of our time is that we have a stupid, blundering administration at Washington that does not trust the people and has established deception as a definite policy.

It is an administration which puts politics above the preservation of the Republic and whose first consideration always is how to get the votes.

It's no wonder that so many patriotic Americans are confused and troubled. No wonder they are asking questions which so far have gone unanswered.

Why did the State Department invite Communist aggression by announcing that Korea and Formosa would not be defended?

Why did the administration ignore the repeated warnings from many sources, including General MacArthur, that the Reds of North Korea were preparing for an invasion across the thirty-eighth parallel in June?

What caused the sudden reversal by the President which sent untrained and inadequately armed soldiers into battle in the early days of the Korean War?

Why did President Truman, on June 1, 3 weeks before the Korean invasion tell the American people and I quote:

"The world is closer to peace now than it has been in the last 5 years."

Why were we deceived regarding our lack of military preparedness?

Why were we lulled into a false sense of security by defense appropriations of $95,000,000,000 in the last 5 years, of which $8,500,000,000 were spent for weapons, planes, tanks, and ships?

Why, at this late date, are the White House and the State Department silent on their reported plan to support the seating of Communist China in the United Nations?

Why? Why? Why?

The questions go on and on.

They echo across the muddy rice paddies and the mountains of Korea, where our boys gave their lives so heroically to win back the losses sustained by a stupid, blundering, tragic policy of weakness and appeasement.

They reecho in the thousands of American homes that are darkened by tragedy as the casualty lists pour in from the blazing battlefront.

What a terrible price to pay because the Democratic leaders failed to understand that Soviet Russia's sole objective is to dominate and enslave the world, including the United States.

The cold, stark, ugly truth is that the party in power at Washington had no policy in the Far East except that which grew out of the shameful black-market deal at Yalta. There the Democratic leadership sold China down the river into the hands of Joe Stalin and his gangster mob.

You will recall that Alger Hiss, friend of Secretary of State Acheson, was one of the keymen in that disastrous departure from the clean traditions of American diplomacy.

The same Alger Hiss was exposed 4 years later as one who passed vital Government secrets to agents of Soviet Russia. Today he is under a prison sentence as the penalty of his disloyalty, even though President Truman called the Hiss case only a red herring.

Never before have the American people faced so serious a crisis with such little confidence in their leaders at Washington.

Freedom in the world is facing its supreme test. The American people are prepared for patriotic and willing sacrifice to build our Nation's defensive strength.

They are prepared to assume a heavier burden of taxation. They are ready to give up many of the things they have enjoyed in order that critical materials may be channeled into war production.

Congress has given the President wide powers to regulate the Nation's economy, to impose price and wage controls, to allocate materials and to restrict credits in order to check inflation.

Republicans in Congress joined with the Democratic majority to confer these powers upon the President as a means of protecting the farmer and the wage earner from the danger of runaway prices and a shrinking dollar.

But the President has virtually ignored the danger. He has failed to act in the face of increasing inflationary pressure that has already sent the price of food, clothing, and all commodities sky-high.

Inflation is no longer a threat. It is here, right now. But Mr. Truman hopes to gain political advantage by postponing rigid controls until after the November election and until the current round of wage increases has run its course.

Keep in mind also that as your cost of living rises the price of every item needed for defense production also jumps upward.

This was explained recently by Mr. John McCone, Under Secretary of the Air Force, when he appeared before the Armed Services Committee of the House.

Mr. McCone stated that rising prices between April and September have reduced the purchasing power of the Air Force by at least $315,000,000. In terms of F-86 jet fighter planes, Mr. McCone said, it means that the Air Force will have to cut down its purchases by 750 planes unless more money is provided.

According to another estimate the $18,000,000,000 appropriated for the Korean emergency will buy only $16,500,000,000 worth of arms and equipment at today's inflated prices.

It would be well for every American to keep in mind that President Truman's failure to halt inflation, after he was given the power to do so, is responsible for a more drastic increase in taxes for defense which must be levied by the next Congress.

When will President Truman and his spendthrift crew realize that world conditions today demand that we cut to the bone every item of domestic spending not connected with national defense?

When will the Washington bureaucrats learn that strength for victory is the only thing that matters now?

When will the Democratic leadership give the people some assurance that the increased taxes they must pay will contribute directly to the preservation of American liberty?

Despite national peril the Truman administration has yielded to every pressure group and is committed to the most extravagant nondefense spending in all our history.

The left-wingers and the pinks continue their fight for visionary socialistic experiments without regard for their cost and fully aware that their schemes would undermine our system of government.

It is shocking in the face of the Korean situation to find Oscar Ewing, the Federal Security Administrator, a Truman spokesman, demanding that the fight for these fantastic proposals be continued with increased intensity.

Appropriations for nondefense spending in this fiscal year are almost double what they were 2 years ago.

With the staggering cost of building our strength at home and abroad how long can we continue a policy of unrestricted spending without plunging into national bankruptcy?

I say to you that every dollar we spend needlessly is a dollar deposited in the bank account of Joe Stalin.

The most shocking attitude I find in Washington is the utter refusal of any department, agency, board, or commission to come forward and point out one place, one function, or one activity of Government where it would be possible to cut down a single dollar.

This stubborn insistence that no savings can be made, coupled with continuous demands for more and more of the taxpayers' money, is to me a convincing indication of criminal waste and extravagance.

For a period of 18 years, with the exception of 2 years when the Republican Eightieth Congress was in control, the result has been unbalanced budgets and deficit spending on a stupendous scale.

In the last 5 years, during a period of our greatest prosperity, we have gone deeper and deeper into debt to support a system of handouts, subsidies, and so-called grants-in-aid, many of which were simply schemes to buy the people's votes with their own money.

Eighteen years of irresponsible government has transformed the great Democratic Party of Thomas Jefferson into a party comparable to the Socialist Party of England.

What have they given us?

They have given us deficit financing.

They have increased taxes to the highest peacetime level.

They have placed upon the backs of the American people the greatest burden of debt of any country in all history.

They have given us inflation and a debased currency so that the purchasing power of the dollar has been cut in half.

They have given us a deficit defense program which found us unprepared in this critical time, although billions and billions of dollars have been appropriated by Congress for the defense and security of our Nation.

They have given us a deficit program in agriculture by spending billions of dollars to keep food prices up. At the same time, vast quantities of food are bulging the warehouses, filling the caves of the country. There it is spoiling while our Government goes into the open market and spends more millions and millions for butter, eggs, milk, cheese, potatoes, and other agricultural products for our Armed Forces.

They have given us a deficit tariff policy which is destroying many American industries and the jobs of American workers through a system of so-called reciprocal-trade agreements. You in West Virginia know what that is doing to the workers in the glass and pottery industries of your State.

They have given us a deficit policy in foreign relations. They have wiped out the great victory we had in World War II and have lost the peace. Now we are again forced to take up arms to restore peace to the world.

Yes, in past 18 years they have given us a deficit policy in morals and integrity. The actions and utterances of Mr. Truman have stripped the high office of President of much of its dignity. The public no longer regards that office with the same respect that it formerly commanded.

They are attempting to force upon the American people a program of socialized medicine, socialized education, socialized agriculture through the Brannan plan, socialized public housing, and many other programs which would destroy the American system of government and the freedom of the individual. They would substitute a controlled and regimented socialistic state.

Eighteen years of misrule have given us confusion, corruption, and communism. Today we find ourselves in danger on all fronts.

There is only one way that we can restore real American principles. There is only one way that we can get back on the path of real Americanism.

There is only one way that we can get back to solvency and a balanced budget. The Republican Party proved in the Eightieth Congress that the budget can be balanced, not by just talking about it, but by adjusting expenditures to income.

There is only one way that we can drive out the Communist conspirators and their disloyal fellow travelers who have entrenched themselves in the State Department and other branches of Government over the past 18 years.

My fellow Americans, there is only one way that we can rid ourselves of those responsible for the mess we are in and substitute bold, courageous leadership that will restore sanity and solvency to this Republic.

That one way is to go out now and work to elect a Republican Congress and lay the foundation-stone for 1952, when we shall go forward to a great Republican victory.

National Defense and International Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the speech which I delivered before the national convention of the American Legion in Los Angeles on October 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND INTERNATIONAL POLICY

Commander Craig, Legionnaires, and distinguished guests, the American Legion and the veterans' organizations should furnish the leadership of the Nation in national defense and international policy. The 20,000,000 veterans of this Nation should lead, not follow. The national commandership of the American Legion is second only to the Presidency of the United States.

National defense and foreign policy are part of their training and background. They know what war means.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

The American Legion's military preparedness program, including universal military training legislation, has varied little over a period of 30 years, and then only in detail. During that period I held every office in our organization from post adjutant up to and including national vice commander, serving on the national defense and other national committees.

CARRIED FIGHT TO SENATE FLOOR

Today I am speaking to you as an active member, a member who has carried the fight for our national defense program from our committees to the floor of the United States Senate.

STATE DEPARTMENT DOMINATION

I am speaking as a member of the American Legion who has seen our programs given lip service by public officials and then sidetracked, defeated, and nullified by the national administrations—over a 30-year period. I do not like it. I will have no part of the administration's attempts through the State Department to control this organization's thinking and leadership in national defense and international affairs. Respectable to be suspected of being a traitor to your country.

ADMINISTRATION STOPPED ENACTMENT OF UMT AND 70-AIR GROUP

Since entering the Senate in 1947, I have joined in introducing two bills for universal military training, but the President, through administration spokesmen in the Senate, prevented either of the bills being reported, with the flimsy excuse that its passage would interfere with the draft; it would have complemented it and gradually merged it into the universal-military-training program.

On the Senate floor I fought for an adequate preparedness program. Here again the administration opposed the 70-air-group appropriation and other adequate programs.

MURDER—NOT WAR

American Legion officials and the veterans of this Nation have stated their belief that had a universal-military-training program been adopted when S. 66, one of the bills which I cosponsored, was introduced, we would not have suffered the early severe setbacks in Korea, with the accompanying loss of American lives and American prestige among nations. The boys who had to be sent first into battle should have had proper fundamental training and the most modern equipment, and would then have had an even break.

Sending young men into battle without proper training and equipment is not war; it is murder.

The Korean situation might never have arisen in the first place, despite State Department bungling, if we had had a definite foreign policy and an adequate national defense organization, spearheaded by an air corps and a submarine fleet, so that the nations of the world and the American people would know that we could enforce our commitments.

WHAT IS OUR FOREIGN POLICY?

This suggests the question: But what are our commitments? The State Department first denied that we would defend Korea, and then caught everyone, including the American people, off guard by suddenly reversing its former position.

For 3 years I have been pressing the executive branch of our Government, which is charged by the Constitution with fixing foreign policy, to name the nations in Europe, Asia, the South Seas, and Africa whose integrity is important to our ultimate safety. With no established foreign policy, the Russians simply may have been trying us out in Korea.

If our foreign policy is not more clearly designed, these tests will continue. Our foreign policy should be determined and it should be told to the world in clear terms what areas are important to our ultimate safety. Let the administration name them and prepare to meet the issue squarely before the American people and the nations of the world.

CRACKPOT, STUPID IDEAS

Our foreign policy, if one can dignify the conglomeration of crackpot ideas as a policy, is at the root of our troubles.

There is no bipartisan foreign policy. There never has been a bipartisan foreign policy. There has been a Truman-Acheson-Lattimore program, decided upon and settled in every instance before the Republicans of the Senate were even informed as to what was under consideration.

MARSHALL PLAN—ECA—ARMS RUSSIA

Let's look briefly at the so-called foreign policy.

As for Europe, the administration forced the ECA down the throats of our taxpayers. Billions of dollars to Europe with no conditions attached. And for what? The United Nations Secretariat recently reported that notwithstanding the billions of dollars poured into Europe by us, Europe's economic problem is not solved and the solution is not in sight. Our taxpayers' money has accomplished one thing: The renewal of the hundred-year-old feuds among the countries of Europe.

Churchill has recently said that the European Marshall plan countries are less able to defend themselves now than they were 3 years ago.

If money is to be sent to foreign countries it should be loaned to private business within those countries, conditioned upon the protection of private property and investments—not given to the current European governments to perpetuate themselves in power.

It could be loaned to private business through the World Bank on the same terms that the RFC loans money to organizations and individuals in this country in times of stress. We should not give our taxpayers' money outright to any foreign government, nor loan it to foreign private business—on less stringent terms than a veteran can borrow it in this country.

STRENGTHENING THE YOKE OF BONDAGE AND SLAVERY

Our taxpayers' money is being used by the ECA in the Far East and Africa for the vile purpose of strengthening the yoke of bondage and slavery and perpetuating misery among the primitive peoples ruled and worked by imperial overlords through the colonial system—and for arming Russia and the iron-curtain countries for a third world war. The colonial system is dead as Julius Caesar, we cannot preserve it through a third world war.

A high British Government official has said quite frankly that the British needed American money not for use in England but to develop her Far East and African colonies—to be farmed for the benefit of the mother country. In condoning the French misuse of ECA moneys in the Far East and north Africa the United States turns its back on morality and its promise to respect independent nations through the United Nations organization. Far from achieving any of its proclaimed objectives the European recovery plan has served there only to consolidate French economic and political domination in Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, and Indochina.

CONSOLIDATING RUSSIA'S GAINS

The aid which we are sending to ECA countries is finding its way in manufactured and processed products to Russia and her satellite countries and to other areas dominated or controlled by Russia, consolidating her gains in the iron-curtain countries and in China.

The Communist countries are being armed by ECA or Marhall-plan countries through trade treaties. I introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a list of 96 trade agreements between ECA countries and countries behind the iron curtain, including Russia, made since the close of World War II. Metalworking tools, steel, ball bearings, electrical machinery and apparatus, grain mills, heavy road machinery, farm machinery, and assembled motor vehicles are a few of the many items being sent to Russia's satellite countries from ECA nations.

It is the opinion of informed people that Russia cannot process and manufacture goods fast enough to keep her satellite countries contented, and without our help Russia will fail in her aggression. It is paradoxical that only with our help can Russia hold her allies and hope to defeat us over the years ahead—and we are giving her that help through the Marshall plan or ECA. It is simply a manufacturing-in-transit program.

HELPING RUSSIA AS WE HELPED JAPAN

We helped Russia in the so-called cold war by furnishing her the processed and manufactured goods to consolidate her gains in eastern Europe and in China.

The Japanese planes that destroyed our fleet in Pearl Harbor were made from the steel shipped to Japan through the Golden Gate in San Francisco during the years preceding World War II.

Much of the tanks, guns, and equipment the boys are facing in Korea were made with the tools and materials furnished Russia, the iron-curtain countries, and Communist China by the 16 European countries, and financed by the Marshall plan or ECA. How stupid can we get, and for how long?

NONAGGRESSION PACTS WITH RUSSIA

Both England and France have nonaggression pacts with Russia which read startlingly like the North Atlantic Pact—we should demand the cancellation of these pacts as a condition of further aid of any kind in eastern Europe and in China. We censured ourselves for permitting a shortsighted administration to send scrap iron and oil to Japan before Pearl Harbor but today we are treating the Communists much better; we are seeing to it that they get, not scrap, but finished products. The Marshall-plan countries which we are supporting are sending Russia and her satellites everything they need to wage world war III.

FOREIGN POLICY—STUPID OR WORSE

Now, let us look briefly at our so-called foreign policy in the Far East.

The many unpleasant chapters of American diplomacy in the Far East, of which Korea is the latest but probably not the last, are a direct sequel to the amateurish bungling, which, in retrospect, actually seems to have been designed to make the Communist dominant in Asia. As a matter of fact, John Foster Dulles told a Republican Senators' luncheon that a group in our State Department believed that a dose of communism would be good for Asia. He simply confirmed what we had already suspected.

We would probably never have faced what President Truman calls this threat to the peace of the world at this early date had it not been for the gross blundering by the administration in the field of foreign policy. At Yalta, with the advice of Dean Acheson's friend, Alger Hiss, since labeled a Red traitor, our ailing President bribed Stalin to intervene in the far-eastern war. This was quite unnecessary for, as Mr. Hiss no doubt well knew, Japan was then on its last legs and had already made several unofficial overtures for peace. Thus the way was paved for a Communist base in North Korea.

WRECKING NATIONAL ECONOMY—GIVING AWAY STRATEGIC AREAS

Our administration has deliberately followed a systematic policy since the close of World War II of giving Russia the strategic areas in Asia and Europe, through international conferences at Yalta, Teheran, and Potsdam, and of wrecking our economy through a free-trade program based upon the 1934 Trade Agreements Act. It is a powerful nation indeed that can stand both of these onslaughts at the same time.

ACHESON CONSULTS NO ONE WITH EXPERIENCE

At a closed meeting of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Acheson was asked whether he had sought the views of General MacArthur on the strategic importance of Formosa. He answered that he was not reporting on MacArthur's views; that he did not necessarily know them. He also said he had not talked to the Joint Chiefs and did not know their views. Three days later Mr. Acheson made the announcement that America's military defense line in the Pacific ran from the Aleutians to the Philippines, including Japan and Okinawa but skipping Korea and Formosa. Undoubtedly Stalin thought he had the nod from Acheson to go ahead. Everything points to that. But Acheson's position on Korea was suddenly reversed, and it may be presumed that he is now apologizing to the Hisses and his other Communist friends.

The President's trip to see MacArthur is fine—but just 5 years late—Chiang is gone, Manchuria is gone; economically and psychologically, we are down in the Pacific.

Our foreign policy has been both casual and improvised. Furthermore, the State Department is unwilling to tell the American people just what commitments have been made.

As a matter of fact, it did not even tell General MacArthur that it had made commitments which might require a Korean campaign. Now, since the stupidity, or deliberate treachery, of the Asia policy makers, Hiss, Lattimore, and Acheson, cannot be denied, the followers of this group have the unmitigated gall to spread the lying whisper that General MacArthur was responsible for the surprise attack on South Korea.

General MacArthur, far from shaping any of the policy, was not even consulted.

WASHINGTON ADMINISTRATION WARNED BY MAC ARTHUR

Is it General MacArthur who determined to withdraw our forces from Korea and leave an ill-equipped constabulary in their place? Is it he who ignored repeated reports of armed raids by Communists across the thirty-eighth parallel, and the urgent warnings from Korean Government officials that heavier attacks were imminent? The answers to these questions are as obvious as the whispered charges against MacArthur are ridiculous.

Now it has since developed that General MacArthur warned the Washington administration 3 months in advance that the South Korean invasion by the Reds was planned for the month of June.

Our State Department had never once consulted either of the two persons best qualified to advise us on our far eastern policy: General MacArthur and Admiral Badger.

The American people pay the penalty in bloodshed and loss of life and in damaged prestige throughout the world—because of stupid incompetence, as well as lack of foresight on the part of our State Department.

ACHESON WHOLLY UNFIT

The handling of the Korean threat is but another instance proving the unfitness of Mr. Acheson for his high position. His administration has been wholly unsatisfactory. It is important that he be removed before other serious blunders are made.

The ideas of the Hisses, the Wadleighs, the Services, and the Lattimores, activated by Acheson, follow a definite pattern. This clique favored giving Manchuria to the Reds at Yalta; they favored the partition of Berlin without any provision for ingress or egress of non-Soviet personnel; they favored communism for China, as disclosed by Dulles; they favored recognition of the Chinese Reds; they favored our sending financial and industrial aid to Russia and those European countries which would arm Russia and consolidate her gains in her satellite nations for world war III.

Evidence of traitorous intent and purpose may be found in the fact that when it was exposed that Britain and other Marshall plan countries were sending Russia war-making materials, not one of this influential clique lifted a finger to stop our money and materials flowing to those countries; in fact, they actually opposed the measure—Senate Joint Resolution 151, the Malone resolution—which would have stopped our indirect arming of Russia. War-making materials are still being sent to Russia, thanks to the Communist lovers in our administration.

COMMUNISTS IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Only the most naive or blind could now doubt that Communists have been in policy-making position in the United States Government. Lee Pressman, the fair-haired New Deal official, recently confessed that he and others were Communists while holding Government office and that Communists moved into Washington and took over key positions in the Government in the early days of this administration. It has been exposed that Communists have held key positions in the Department of Agriculture, Commerce, Labor, State, and Justice, in the Treasury, the OSS, Board of Economic Warfare, Air Corps Matérial and Service Division, War Production Board, OPA, WPA, and many other Government offices.

In their attempts to discredit American industry and free enterprise, the smart pinkish members of the administration were serving their Moscow masters well. It is interesting to observe that we have been led step by step into a socialistic government in Washington.

The amazing thing about all this is that Communist associates and sympathizers are permitted to continue in high office and influence the President. Apparently this deplorable situation will not be corrected until the American people themselves correct it at the polls.

SOCIALISTS AND COMMUNISTS OBJECTIVES THE SAME

The ultimate objectives of the Communists and Socialists are the same—government control with the individual owning nothing. The difference is that a Communist will shoot you to gain his objective while a Socialist will spend you into it. A Communist is just an impatient Socialist.

FACE THE ISSUE

Until this country squarely faces its errors in foreign and domestic policy, until it abandons the spend-and-elect theories of welfare statism, until it abandons the "one economic world" Marxist program of free trade—and world distribution of our hard-earned wealth, we will continue to tremble before the threats of a people backward in production and culture.

We need to remind ourselves that our first and foremost task is to keep ourselves strong. The anti-Communist forces of the world that are able and willing to fight are outnumbered. The defense of the free world must be achieved by the quality of training and equipment which can overcome quantity. We are not big enough to overwhelm our opponents by the massing of military power. Since we cannot hope to be bigger, our fate depends on whether we can be better trained and better equipped.

NAME THE AREAS THE INTEGRITY OF WHICH IS IMPORTANT TO OUR SAFETY

The United States of America should immediately establish a definite foreign policy, naming the nations in Europe, Asia, the South Seas, and Africa, if any, whose integrity is important to our ultimate safety, notifying the world that we would consider the attempt of any nation to extend its system of government into those areas as an overt act against the United States. This would be a logical broadening of our Monroe Doctrine, which has served us well for 127 years in the Western Hemisphere.

REAL THREAT FROM WITHIN

Where is the greatest danger—at home or abroad? We have been repeatedly warned that we are in danger from within. Since 1932 there has been a constant war against America, within our gates.

On the home front, the Red plot has been carried on within the administration by a constant attack on American industry. This attack has come through, first, Government regulations so designed as to eliminate venture capital, which made this country great; second, taxes so designed as to eliminate initiative; third, a foreign free trade policy so designed as to curtail domestic production; and, fourth, reckless spending on the part of the Government so designed as to threaten our whole economic structure.

CLEAN UP THE HOME FRONT—SAVE OUR ECONOMIC STRUCTURE

Let us clean up the home front, give assurance to American people that American industries and things American will be protected. Let us once and for all put a stop to the stupid foreign programs which weaken our position abroad and destroy our industries at home. Let's fight for American ideals and for an administration that will uphold them when this war is at an end. The boys on the front have little to fight for unless they can know clearly that they are defending the American way of life. The American Legion must not let them down.

The American Legion and the veterans of this Nation—nearly 20,000,000 strong—can do the job. Let us develop a few leaders who are for America like Churchill is for England. Only then will we have a basis for a sound international cooperation that will make some sense. Let us stop this senseless, stupid apologizing for America and for Americans who love America, and let us establish a real leadership that the world will be glad to follow, and that conceivably could keep us out of a major conflict for a generation.

Meet Paul Raver

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the October 8, 1950, issue of the Sunday Oregonian on Dr. Paul Raver. I commend it especially to those who may have believed the article which appeared some weeks ago in the Reader's Digest. The Digest article contained allegations which were proven false by my colleague the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] and myself.

It gives me a great deal of personal pleasure to further set the record straight. We of Montana—and the Northwest—owe a great deal to Dr. Raver for his friendliness, his integrity, and his understanding of our problems. The new industries, the new power, and the new spirit of cooperation that is coming into Montana can largely be attributed to the far-seeing vision and intelligent understanding Dr. Raver has shown. He is a public servant in the finest and highest tradition.

The article follows:

MEET PAUL RAVER—SOME CONSIDER HIM COLD PLOTTER, OTHERS TRUE CHRISTIAN

(By Paul Hauser)

Dr. Paul Jerome Raver, a man admired by his pastor as one whose main motivation is the Christian ethic, is regarded in some circles as an octopus with electrical transmission lines for tentacles.

He is not so regarded by those of his opponents in the dialectics of power policy who know him best, although their regard for his sincerity and integrity has not greatly tempered their differences with him.

Dr. Raver, a calm, poised, and deliberate man of 56 who likes to contemplate an idea of a Pacific Northwest industrial empire powered by the Columbia River, is an engineer and an economist who came to run the Federal Government's electrical distribution system in the Pacific Northwest 11 years ago. He had been chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission and head of the department of public utilities of Northwestern University.

When he came he believed in the worth of public ownership of utilities under proper circumstances and he still does. He also believes the Bonneville Act directs him to give preference in sale of Federal power to publicly owned utilities, and, as he has said many times, he will continue to believe so and do so until Congress changes the Bonneville Act.

He has been called a Socialist, condemned as a plotter on the floor of Congress, and hanged in effigy.

While Raver is known to close associates in the Bonneville Administration as a deeply sensitive man who is hurt by unfair criticism, he resents any attempt to shield him from it. He has shown restraint not usually considered typical of his Scotch-Irish descent in avoiding fruitless personal controversies as result of such attacks. He sometimes writes a hot answering letter, shows it to a few of his office intimates, and then tears it up.

Dr. Raver's pastor and close personal friend, Dr. Myron C. Cole, of the First Christian Church, believes Dr. Raver's strong religious feeling and his regular habit of worship account for his depth of understanding and probably give him the poise and serenity so evident when he is baited.

Known to friends who have fished and played poker with him as a warmly friendly man and a good companion and known to other Bonneville employees as an intensely kind and loyal boss, Dr. Raver sometimes gives strangers an impression of aloof coldness.

Raver's light brown eyes, which gaze levelly from behind inconspicuous spectacles, were once described as cold as a rattlesnake's by an eastern Oregon politician who met him casually.

Whatever his casual judgments, Raver is greatly respected by men who have met and battled with him across a conference table. One of these is Franklin T. Griffith, chairman of the board of the Portland General Electric Co.

"Paul Raver is a man of very high ideals," Mr. Griffith said recently. "He has a job under the Department of the Interior. He entered it with an understanding of the powers and duties of that office with which I was not in accord, but in which he honestly believes. He has tried to carry out his conception of the law under which he was appointed. I do not think he is a Socialist, but on the contrary believe that he has a very firm conviction that free enterprise is the secret of American success. He harmonizes his belief in free enterprise with his belief in the propriety and advantage of public ownership of some utility operations."

In his administration of the Government's $162,000,000 Columbia power distribution system, a job for which he is now paid $12,200 a year, Dr. Raver is a man who, according to his coworkers, is insistent that he be supplied no phony facts.

"He never proceeds on the theory that we are right when a complaint comes in," an assistant said recently. "He says to get the facts. He doesn't want any phony answers to anything."

Dr. Raver has gone so far to get the facts that Bonneville offers a rarity among Government agencies. Its accounts are audited twice—once by the Government and once by a private accounting firm of national stature which specializes in utility accounting. That ended criticism that the agency's bookkeeping was rigged.

Dr. Raver is to the men around him a rare combination of the dreamer and the practical man. He is practical enough to fight to run the agency on a business basis, but can dream of the time when Bonneville again has spare power to sell to attract industries to the Northwest.

"He's a dreamer if there ever was one," said an associate. "He sees the Columbia River," as he has said, "as an oil well that never runs dry." Nothing thrills him more than finding some new industry has come in.

Running the power agency through a war and then through unexpected power shortages provided tough times enough to make Raver's hair get grayer, but neither was the hardest time he had to face. That was in 1947 when he had to discharge 650 people under congressional "economy" orders.

"They were people who lived here, people for whom I had personal affection," he said recently.

Dr. Raver's deep interest in people as people and in their problems is one of the things that come up in almost weekly "coffee and fireplace" sessions of Dr. Raver, Reverend Cole, and their wives.

"We sometimes chew the fat after a meeting 'way into the wee hours of the night," Dr. Cole said, "talking about matters of people and democracy and Christian ethics."

Dr. Raver's church connections are of long standing and deep-rooted in his Nebraska farm background. He first met his wife at a church supper. He was president of the Chicago Disciples Union before he came to Oregon and is now one of the 15 members of the executive committee of the Disciples of Christ international convention.

At home Dr. Raver likes to work with power tools, play the piano (he's a good jazz player in the 1920's idiom) and be a backyard chef on the barbecue grill he recently constructed in what the Ravers call "the back 40" of their Eastmoreland home. He is also a doting grandparent to the children of his two daughters, Mrs. Robert W. Irish, of Portland, and Mrs. Alan H. Jones, of McMinnville.

Mrs. Raver says he's an easy man to cook for. He likes nearly everything but fish—which proves he's a fisherman.

ECA Payments to American Publishers and Movie Producers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a list of payments made by the Economic Cooperation Administration—ECA—to newspapers, weekly publications, and book companies, subsidizing them in the export of their publications to Europe for propaganda purposes.

Time and Life magazines together received $122,961.21 from April 3, 1948, through August 30, 1950, and Reader's Digest received $123,998.37, and the New York Herald Tribune received $59,975.76 during the same period, and other publications received the amounts listed.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune]

WASHINGTON, September 7.—The Paris edition of the Herald Tribune has been engaged in a red hot circulation war recently with the overseas airmail edition of the New York Times. The Times has reported its overseas airmail edition has been a sell-out almost from the start.

The biggest subsidy payments made in August by ECA went to the Motion Picture

Exporters Association and to RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., which enlisted the aid of the American taxpayers to show their films in Germany. The association collected $100,000, and RKO got $127,356.

ECA sold Congress on the idea of subsidizing the circulation of American newspapers, magazines, and books, and the showing of American movies in Europe to teach Europeans the American way of life. The subsidy payments were made under investment guaranty contracts signed with ECA, whereby the Marshall plan agency bought from the companies any nonconvertible European currencies collected from their overseas operations.

Total subsidies paid the American publishers and movie producers during August and from April 3, 1948 through August 30, 1950, follow:

Acheson Should Resign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a July 19, 1950, press release giving my reasons for asking the resignation of Dean Acheson.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, today demanded the resignation of Secretary of State Dean Acheson for his stupid bungling in foreign policy which has brought this country to its present plight, and for a complete reorganization of the Department.

Continuing, Senator MALONE said: "We have been led into the Korean War, which will cost us the wealth of lives and material. Having committed ourselves and finding ourselves in this thing, we will make every necessary sacrifice to win. This wholehearted uniting of our efforts to win does not, however, take one iota from the stigma of stupidity on the part of our officials who made it possible for us to get into this predicament.

"The many unpleasant chapters of American diplomacy in the Far East, of which Korea is the latest but probably not the last, are a direct sequel to amateurish bungling, which, in retrospect, actually seems to have been designed to make the Communist dominant in Asia. I am reliably informed that a group in our State Department believed that communism would be good for Asia.

"We would probably never have faced what President Truman calls this 'threat to the peace of the world' had it not been for the gross blundering by the administration in the field of foreign policy. At Yalta, with the advice of Dean Acheson's friend, one Alger Hiss, since labeled a Red traitor, our ailing President 'bribed' Stalin to intervene in the far eastern war. This was quite unnecessary for, as Mr. Hiss no doubt well knew, Japan was then on its last legs and had already made several unofficial overtures for peace. Thus the way was paved for a Communist base in North Korea.

"Mr. Acheson's recent statement that the United States would not use its veto power in the United Nations to block recognition of the Communists regime in China was a weak-kneed position to take against the advancing aggressor, and was virtually an invitation to the Reds to go further.

"Either the State Department should have clearly abandoned southern Korea or should have done the things necessary to make it clear that an attack on southern Korea would be opposed by us. It did neither. Why? Partly because our foreign policy is both casual and improvised, and partly because the State Department is unwilling to tell the American people just what it has committed them to.

"It is imperative that a stop be put to the State Department's deficit diplomacy. The administration has allowed our commitments to increase while our power to meet them has been allowed to decline.

"Obviously, General MacArthur did not prepare for a Korean campaign because our State Department had never informed him that it had made commitments which might require such a campaign.

"Our State Department never once consulted either of the two persons best qualified to advise us on our far eastern policy: General MacArthur and Admiral Badger.

"Now the American people must pay the penalty in bloodshed and loss of life and in damaged prestige throughout the world because of incompetence as well as lack of foresight on the part of our State Department.

"We went into this shooting war to wage a political fight against the Russians. Today it looks like the shrewd Russians may simply ignore the challenge, neither backing down nor openly fighting. As in Greece and in the Berlin airlift, we may be left to expend our energy while the Russians rest and continue their preparations, with, of course, the help of the Marshall-plan nations which are shipping to Russia, her satellite countries in Europe and Communist China, materials needed to wage war. Through 96 trade treaties between Marshall-plan countries and iron-curtain countries, we are even today arming Russia to wage world war III.

"Perhaps in Korea the Russians were trying to see how far they could go. If our foreign policy is not more clearly designed, these tests will continue. It ought to be determined what this country can do and what it is willing to do, and those things should be told to the world in clear terms. What areas are important to our ultimate safety? What areas are we to defend? Let the administration name them so that everyone will know.

"What is to be our policy regarding the continuation of arming Russia through the Marshall-plan countries? What is to be our policy in regard to one of those nations, England, furnishing petroleum and other war materials to Communist China, some of which has found its way to Korea? What is the Korean war intended to accomplish? What do we do after we have pushed the North Koreans back across the thirty-eighth parallel? Do we intend to garrison all of Korea for the indefinite future? Is the sending of troops to Korea to be regarded as a precedent? If so, of what? Despite our low opinion of the State Department, we find it hard to believe they got into this thing without an idea of what they mean to make of it. They at least owe the soldiers, their wives and parents, and the taxpayers an explanation that so far has not been forthcoming.

"The stupid handling of the Korean threat is but another instance proving the unfitness of Mr. Acheson for his high position. His administration has been wholly unsatisfactory."

As the Representative in Congress from the Ninth District of Minnesota, it has been my pleasure to have been of official service to thousands of veterans. Any veteran having a problem with a Federal agency who contacts me, always will receive my fullest official aid and cooperation. Besides voting for all meritorious veterans' legislation, I introduced the following bills myself:

H. R. 1216, January 10, 1949: A bill to amend the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, as amended, so as to provide an increase in pay for certain personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

H. R. 2024, January 31, 1949: A bill to extend pension benefits under the laws reenacted by Public Law 269, Seventy-fourth Congress, August 13, 1935, as now or hereafter amended, to certain persons who served with the United States military or naval forces engaged in hostilities in the Moro Province, including Mindanao, or in the islands of Samar and Leyte, after July 4, 1902, and prior to January 1, 1914, and to their unremarried widows, child, or children.

H. R. 4275, April 14, 1949: A bill to extend the status of veterans of World War I to persons enrolled or enlisted and serving on United States Shipping Board vessels during World War I in war zones.

H. R. 4999, June 6, 1949: A bill to provide that the Veterans' Administration shall furnish the children of certain deceased veterans medical, hospital, and domiciliary care.

H. R. 5905, August 5, 1949: A bill to amend Veterans' Preference Act of 1944 so as to grant certain peacetime veterans and their unmarried widows preference in employment where Federal funds are disbursed.

H. R. 8324, May 2, 1950: A bill to amend the Career Compensation Act of 1949 to provide the maximum retirement pay for certain retired enlisted men for the period from July 1, 1942, through June 30, 1946.

H. R. 9679, September 15, 1950: A bill to amend Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a) to extend the period of presumption of service-connection in the case of pulmonary tuberculosis from 3 to 7 years.

These have not become law, although some provisions have been adopted into legislation which has become law.

I invite veterans to write to me at any time. I am your United States Representative in Congress and your friend. I will be glad to hear from you and I assure you of my fullest cooperation and assistance at any time.

My name and address is Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN, 205 United States Post Office Building, Crookston, Minn.

If I am reelected as your Congressman—United States Representative in Congress—on November 7, my address on and after January 3 again will be 1405 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

The veterans of the Ninth District are fortunate in having a splendid group of county service officers. Veterans can always get good cooperation from these men. They know their job and they are very helpful to veterans and their dependents. The county service officers in the Ninth District are as follows: Ralph Reinhardt, Becker County service officer, Detroit Lakes, Minn.; E. A. Axelson, Beltrami County service officer, Bemidji, Minn.; Leslie Welter, Jr., Clay County service officer, Moorhead, Minn.; F. J. Hanson, Clearwater County service officer, Bagley, Minn.; E. R. Fitzgerald, Kittson County service officer, Hallock, Minn.; Ira L. Brazie, Lake of the Woods County service officer, Baudette, Minn.; Allen W. Benson, Mahnomen County service officer, Mahnomen, Minn.; John W. Sands, Marshall County service officer, Warren, Minn.; Merton Johnson, Norman County service officer, Ada, Minn.; Philip M. Kjaglien, Otter Tail County service officer, Fergus Falls, Minn.; H. B. Rafteseth, Pennington and Red Lake County service officer, Thief River Falls, Minn.; Earl G. Barness, Polk County service officer, Crookston, Minn.; C. R. Turner, Roseau County service officer, Roseau, Minn.; George M. Korbel, Wilkin County service officer, Breckenridge, Minn.

Your Expanded Social Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, the American public must fully realize that one of the important achievements of this Eighty-first Congress is the passage of the bill, H. R. 6000, expanding and bringing up to date our social-security system. This bill marks substantial progress in the field of social legislation and has long been overdue. A great part of the credit for this progressive legislation is due to the work and long effort of my distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH], who is going to be the next Governor of the State of New York. There has been Nation-wide interest in the provisions of this new social-security bill ever since we passed it here in the House last October. Now that President Truman has signed the bill and it has become Public Law 734, I feel it might be helpful to my constituents to describe the major changes in our social-security system occasioned by the new law.

MAJOR CHANGES

Briefly summarized, the major changes are:

(a) Larger benefits: The 354,843 New Yorkers receiving social-security payments as of August 31, 1950, will find that in the checks to be mailed out next month their benefits will be, on the average, roughly 75 percent greater than they have been. For those persons who will retire after June 1952, benefits will be twice what they are now, on the average.

(b) Broader coverage: On January 1, 1951, nearly 1,000,000 people in the State of New York who up to now have not been covered by social security, will come under the system. For the first time the nonfarm self-employed—persons owning small businesses such as grocery stores, retail stores, or gas stations—will have the opportunity to earn social-security privileges.

(c) Easier eligibility: In general, it will take less years of social-security "coverage" before you are eligible to draw benefits. Persons who are now 65 or over, and who have had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of social-security "coverage" can and should apply immediately for benefits. Any retired worker, as well as survivors and dependents, will be able to earn $50 a month as against the present limit of $15 without losing their benefit payments.

LARGER BENEFITS

How much larger will benefits be under the new law? Increases in the amount of benefits will go to two main groups: (a) Those who are currently receiving benefits, or who will begin receiving them before 1952; and (b) those who will reach retirement age after June 1952. Let us see how the new bill affects each of these groups.

There are approximately 354,843 people in the State of New York now receiving social-security benefits. In the checks which they will receive early in October—their September payment—they will find that their payments will be, on the average, 77½ percent greater than they have been up to now.

The following table shows the amount of increases for an insured wage earner without any dependents, and for a married couple:

Retired wage earner without dependents		Retired wage earner and wife

$45	68.50	$67.50	102.75
$46	68.50	$69.00	102.75

These same increases apply to anyone who retires before June 1952.

The next table contains the amounts of the September checks for widows with two children who are presently receiving social security:

WIDOW WITH TWO CHILDREN

Present benefit: $20; new benefit: $40.
Present benefit: $25; new benefit: $46.
Present benefit: $30; new benefit: $53.
Present benefit: $35; new benefit: $59.

Present benefit: $65; new benefit: $122.
Present benefit: $70; new benefit: $128.
Present benefit: $75; new benefit: $133.

YOU DO NOT HAVE TO APPLY FOR INCREASES

Your increases will be mailed to you automatically. If, however, your increase is not included in your October check, you will receive it very soon thereafter, in full. Please do not write to the Government for information because the more letters that have to be answered, the longer it will take for the program to get fully under way.

If you retire after June 1952, a new formula may be used to compute benefits. This formula will yield approximately twice the amount of benefits now being received. A person can begin to use this new formula just as soon as he has worked for six quarter-years—a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The next table demonstrates in round figures the approximate amount of the benefits, according to this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$50	$25	$38
$100	50	75
$150	58	87
$200	65	98
$250	72	109
$300	80	120

The amount of the minimum primary benefit has been increased from $10 to $25, in most cases, and the maximum family benefit has been increased from $85 to $150. These are sorely needed and long overdue changes when we consider present high living costs.

WHAT NEW PEOPLE WILL BE COVERED?

On January 1, 1951, approximately 1,000,000 people in the State of New York—nearly 10,000,000 in the Nation as a whole—will come under the social-security system for the first time.

THE NONFARM SELF-EMPLOYED

The largest group to be admitted to the system are the nonfarm self-employed, numbering about 580,000 persons in our State. For the first time, the druggist, the grocer, the candy-store man, the gas-station owner, and thousands of other small-business men who are in business for themselves, will be covered by social security, and will be able to draw benefits when they reach the retirement age of 65. This does not include many professional people, such as doctors and lawyers. Industrial home workers, under certain circumstances, would be included.

I should emphasize for the benefit of these small-business men, as well as all those who will now come under the social-security system, it will be much easier for you to become eligible for benefits under the new law. If you are 62 or over on January 1, 1951, and begin your coverage on that date, you will need only a year and a half of coverage in order to begin drawing benefits. This means that you will begin to draw benefits just as soon as you reach the retirement age of 65.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

About 122,500 New York domestic servants and workers in nonfarm homes will join the system beginning January 1, 1950, provided they work 24 days for 1 employer and receive cash wages of at least $50 during each quarterly period.

VOLUNTARY COVERAGE FOR STATE AND LOCAL EMPLOYEES

Roughly 99,000 employees of the State, and of cities, towns, or counties in New York State may come under the system if a voluntary agreement is reached between the State and the Federal Government. In order that no existing retirement system will be interfered with, no one covered by a State or city retirement system when the agreement is reached will be covered. Employees of the Federal Government not presently covered by a Federal retirement system will be included.

EMPLOYEES OF NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Employees of hospitals, churches, schools, and the like will be covered only if the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution and if two-thirds or more of the employees favor social-security coverage. Ministers and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

SALESMEN AND TRUCK DRIVERS INCLUDED

All full-time life-insurance salesmen, certain full-time traveling salesmen, other than house-to-house, and many delivery truck drivers who satisfy certain conditions will be covered.

HOW LONG DOES IT TAKE TO QUALIFY?

One of the greatest advantages of the new law is that in the future you will not have to work under the social-security system nearly as long before you can retire and begin to draw security benefits. The retirement age is still age 65 but under the new law you will only have to be in "covered employment"—that is, employment under the social-security system—for half of the time elapsed since January 1, 1951. "Coverage" before that date may be used to fulfil this requirement. The present law requires "coverage" for only half of the time since January 1, 1937. In all cases, at least six quarter-years, or a year and a half, of coverage will be required. Under the old law, 27 quarter-years—nearly 7 full years—of coverage was required for a man or woman now 65 years of age who wanted to retire.

IF YOU ARE AGED 65

Any insured worker who is now 65 or over and who has had six quarter-years—or a full year and a half—of social-security coverage can draw benefits immediately.

Any worker who is 62 or over in January 1951, even if he or she only starts his social-security coverage next year, will be eligible to begin drawing benefits just as soon as he reaches the retirement age of 65, if he has had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of coverage.

THE NEWLY COVERED

Most important to the thousands who will become eligible to join the social-security system next year—it will be possible to begin drawing benefits upon retirement (at age 65) with much less coverage than now.

The next table shows how many quarter-years of coverage you will have to have under the old and new law. Simply look at the figure next to your age on January 1, 1951:

Quarters of coverage required to be fully insured

DEPENDENTS' AND SURVIVORS' BENEFITS

How much will survivors and dependents receive under the new law? The primary benefit is the payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents. Generally speaking, dependents and survivors will receive the same part of the primary benefit as at present. This means that their benefits will also be about 75 percent higher than at present, up until 1952, and double the present levels after that time.

The major changes in survivors' and dependents' benefits are:

(1) A retired worker's wife who is under 65 years of age may receive benefits if she has a child in her care.

(2) The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the primary benefit of the wage earner—it is only one-half at the present time.

(3) Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the primary benefit of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Before now these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivors' benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

(4) Retired workers, survivors, or dependents are permitted to now earn up to $50 a month, as against $14.99 under the present law, without losing their benefit privileges.

I believe that the Congress should soon enact further improvements in our social security, such as including an insurance system for the permanently and totally disabled, and lowering the retirement age to 60, both of which I have long recommended.

In conclusion, let me say that our new social-security law is a great step forward; a step of which I believe the Congress and the people of our great Nation may well be proud.

Legion Demands Reds Be Outlawed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD various news dispatches reporting action taken by the national convention of the American Legion in Los Angeles in connection with outlawing communism and its advocates.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Evening Herald and Express of October 9, 1950]

SENATOR MALONE SAYS UNITED STATES ARMING RUSS THROUGH EUROPE AID

The United States is stupidly arming Russia for a third world war by permitting recipients of Marshall-plan money to send war materials to the Soviets.

That warning was sounded today by United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, who arrived here with his wife for the national convention of the American Legion. The Nevada Senator is scheduled to address the Legionnaires on Wednesday.

"It may not be generally known," he declared, "but it is a fact that 16 Marshall-plan countries have 96 trade treaties with Russia and are supplying the Communists with the sinews of war, including everything from clothespins to steam engines."

RESTRICTIONS URGED

"We should demand that conditions be attached to any further financing of Marshall-plan countries that would forbid these shipments of matériel which eventually will be used against us."

Senator MALONE said there should be an end to the financing of Socialist and Communist governments.

"The United States is making the same mistake it made when it sent steel and oil to Japan in the months preceding Pearl Harbor," he said. "Are we ever going to learn? How stupid can we be?"

The Nevada Senator bitterly assailed France and England for having a 20-year nonaggression pact with Russia, while at the same time being signatories to the Atlantic Pact.

CHOICE DUE

"This," he emphasized, "is a complete contradiction. When the flag is up, France and England will have to make a choice."

MALONE complained that the Truman administration has no foreign policy, and that the time has come for this country to make it clear to the world where we stand, what we are prepared to defend, and get ready to do it.

"We must have universal military training," he said. "If we are ready, there is a good chance that another war can be averted for another generation."

[From the Los Angeles Evening Herald and Express of October 11, 1950]

SENATOR MALONE IN FIERY LEGION MEET TALK SAYS ACHESON MUST GO—CRACKPOT FOREIGN POLICY IDEALS HIT BY NEVADA SOLON

In a fiery speech before the 1950 national convention of the American Legion, United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, demanded immediate removal of Secretary of State Dean Acheson before more stupid mistakes are made.

He charged:

1. That American taxpayers' money is being used to arm Russia for world war III.

2. That the United States foreign policy is a conglomeration of crackpot ideas.

3. Tanks used by the Red Koreans were financed through the Marshall plan by way of trade agreements between Marshall-plan and iron-curtain countries.

4. That there is no bipartisan foreign policy but only a Truman-Acheson-Lattimore program.

5. That Acheson never consulted Gen. Douglas MacArthur or any other American military figure before announcing abandonment of Formosa.

6. That Communists in governmental posts are waging a deliberate war at home to destroy the American economic structure.

7. That taxpayers' money is being loaned to foreign private business on less stringent terms than a veteran can borrow it in this country.

8. That our taxpayers money is being used by the ECA in the Far East and Africa for the vile purpose of strengthening the yoke of bondage and slavery and perpetuating misery among the primitive peoples ruled and worked by imperial overlords through the colonial system.

Senator MALONE, a former national vice commander of the American Legion, blamed both the Acheson foreign policy and the failure of Congress to enact universal military training for the Korean War.

HITS TRAINING LACK

"Sending young men into battle without proper training and equipment is not war; it is murder," he said grimly.

Only once did Malone depart from his attack on American foreign policy to warn the Legionnaires that "since 1938 there has been a constant war against America within our gates."

"On the home front," he cried angrily, "the Red plot has been carried on within the administration by a constant attack on American industry.

"This attack has come through, first, Government regulations so designed as to eliminate venture capital which made this country great; second, taxes so designed as to eliminate initiative; a foreign 'free trade' policy so designed as to curtail domestic production; and, fourth, reckless spending on the part of the Government so designed as to threaten our whole economic structure."

HITS ORIENT POLICY

Senator MALONE flayed Acheson bitterly for the Far East policy of the State Department and charged that "undoubtedly, Stalin thought he had the nod from Acheson to go ahead" in Korea.

"Everything points to that," he asserted. "But Acheson's position on Korea was suddenly reversed, and it may be presumed that he is now apologizing to the Hisses and his other Communist friends.

"Our administration has deliberately followed a systematic policy since the close of World War II of giving Russia the strategic areas in Asia and Europe, through international conferences at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, and of wrecking our economy through a free-trade program based on the 1934 Trade Agreement Act. It is a powerful nation, indeed, that can stand both of these onslaughts at the same time."

CONSULTED NO ONE

"At a closed meeting of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Acheson was asked whether he had sought the views of General MacArthur on the strategic importance of Formosa. He answered that he was not reporting on MacArthur's views, that he did not necessarily know them. He also said he had not talked to the Joint Chiefs of Staff and did not know their views.

"Three days later, Mr. Acheson made the announcement that America's military defense line in the Pacific ran from the Aleutians to the Philippines, including Japan and Okinawa but skipping Korea and Formosa.

"The State Department is unwilling to tell the American people just what commitments have been made.

"As a matter of fact, it did not even tell General MacArthur that it had made commitments which might require a Korean campaign."

WARNED BY MAC ARTHUR

"Now, since the stupidity or deliberate treachery of the Asia policymakers, Hiss, Lattimore, and Acheson, cannot be denied, the followers of this group have the unmitigated gall to spread the lying whisper that General MacArthur was responsible for the surprise attack on South Korea.

"General MacArthur, far from shaping any of the policy, was not even consulted.

"General MacArthur warned the Washington administration 3 months in advance that the South Korean invasion by the Reds was planned for the month of June."

MALONE castigated the administration of the Marshall plan, vigorously declaring that the administration forced it "down the throats of our taxpayers."

"Billions of dollars to Europe with no conditions attached," he cried. "And for what?"

URGES REAL LEADERSHIP

"The United Nations secretariat recently reported that notwithstanding the billions of dollars poured into Europe by us, Europe's economic problem is not solved and the solution is not in sight. Our taxpayers' money has accomplished one thing: The renewal of hundred-year-old feuds among the countries in Europe."

Senator MALONE closed his address with a plea to the veterans to "develop a few leaders who are for America like Churchill is for England."

"Let us stop this senseless, stupid apoligizing for America and for Americans who love America, and let us establish a real leadership that the world will be glad to follow, and that conceivably could keep us out of the major conflict for a generation."

The ouster of Dean Acheson has been demanded by several top-ranking legionnaires including National Commander George N. Craig. The demand will undoubtedly come before the convention for action in one of the reports.

LEGION DEMANDS REDS BE OUTLAWED—WOULD TRY ALL COMMUNISTS

(By Walter Naughton)

Communism and its advocates, administration bungling which weakened America in the face of open or covert Communist advance—these came under heavy fire at the American Legion convention yesterday.

Delegates applauded and cheered as speakers demanded the immediate ouster of Secretary of State Dean Acheson and energetic enforcement of the new Communist control measure.

They applauded and cheered again as speakers voiced open defiance of Stalin and as Congresswoman EDITH NOURSE ROGERS warned the Soviet dictator that "if you want war, we will drive you from this earth."

They enthusiastically approved resolutions calling for such action as:

Outlawing of the Communist party in America as an agent of a foreign government, with a constitutional amendment if necessary.

Immediate detention, for reasons of national security, of all known Communist Party members; trial of those who are American citizens as traitors, and those not citizens to be treated as enemy spies.

Many other resolutions followed the same line.

The convention adjourned without hearing or acting upon two important committee reports. One is from the foreign affairs committee, which may present resolutions dealing with Secretary of State Dean Acheson and other individuals and actions concerning international relations. The other is from the national security committee, in whose jurisdiction come such matters as universal military training and national defense. Both will report today.

All three speakers of the day—Congresswoman ROGERS, United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, and United States Senator KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota—launched vigorous attacks upon the administration for—

Its faint-hearted handling of the Communist menace.

Its false economy in cutting down national defense.

Its blindness to the warnings of such leaders as Gen. Douglas MacArthur and the necessity for such measures as universal military training.

MALONE demanded the immediate ouster of Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Resolutions which were directed toward a stronger America included:

Outlawing not only of the Communist Party but of all subversive and front organizations.

Disbarment of members of the National Lawyers Guild for following the party line.

Continuance of the House Un-American Activities Committee with sufficient appropriations.

Subversive groups to be refused permits to meet in public buildings or hold parades.

ADEQUATE COURSES IN UNITED STATES HISTORY

Adequate courses in American history in high schools and colleges as a prerequisite for graduation.

Removal from office of any public official who tolerates Communist activities within his department.

Redoubling of loyalty checks on Government employees.

Better supervision of immigrants here under special or temporary visas.

Compulsory arbitration of labor disputes during emergencies.

More severe screening of displaced persons permitted to enter the country.

The invoking of economic sanctions upon trade with Russia or her satellites.

CONVENTION CHEERS CONGRESSWOMAN

It was a day of enthusiasm that reached its highest pitch when the delegates, meeting in Shrine Auditorium, rose to their feet to cheer Congresswoman ROGERS as she concluded her dramatic defiance of Stalin.

Her brief speech was given as she accepted the Legion's highest honor, the organization's Distinguished Service Medal, which has been awarded to only 36 persons in 32 years.

Castigating the administration for permitting the Nation to become "weak and unprepared," even after the lesson of two wars, and for putting "politics and office holding" ahead of national defense on the false claim of economy, Mrs. ROGERS declared:

"All of this took place with a cold war in progress which might at any moment break out into a hot war; while Communist Russia was developing the mightiest military machine ever known in the world.

"All of this took place while communism was already on the march and while the threat to America was gaining in intensity by the hour.

"It was because America was unprepared that Hitler started World War II, and because America was weak that Stalin started the Communist drive on South Korea."

CAN'T DEFEAT UNITED STATES BY NAME CALLING

Dramatically directing her words to Stalin, she said:

"By your name calling, your lies, you cannot defeat America. Men who know the value of freedom cannot be propagandized into slavery.

"If it is your desire to have war, you will have to fight America and the other free nations.

"We will drive you from this earth."

It was then that the delegates stood and cheered.

Demanding immediate action to remedy administration blunders, MALONE said:

"American Legion officials have stated their belief that had a universal military training program been adopted we would not have suffered the early severe setbacks in Korea, with the accompanying loss of American lives and American prestige among nations.

"Sending young men into battle without proper training and equipment is not war; it is murder."

ATTACKS LACK OF FOREIGN POLICY

Attacking the lack of definite foreign policy, he said:

"Our foreign policy, if one can dignify the conglomeration of crackpot ideas as a policy, is at the root of our troubles. There is no bipartisan foreign policy. There never has been a bipartisan foreign policy."

Turning to sharp criticism of ECA and the Marshall plan, he declared:

"The aid which we are sending to ECA countries is finding its way in manufactured and processed products to Russia and her satellites and to other areas dominated or controlled by Russia, consolidating her gains in the iron-curtain countries and in China.

"Both England and France have nonaggression pacts with Russia which read startlingly like the Atlantic Pact—we should demand the cancellation of these pacts as a condition of further aid of any kind in eastern Europe and in China."

Declaring that the State Department could not plead ignorance of the danger in Korea, MALONE said:

"It has developed that General MacArthur warned the Washington administration 3 months in advance that the South Korean invasion by the Reds was planned for the month of June."

NEVER CONSULTED SERVICE LEADERS

"Our State Department never once consulted either of the two persons best qualified to advise us on our far eastern policy—General MacArthur and Admiral Badger.

"The handling of the Korean threat is but another instance proving the unfitness of Mr. Acheson for his high position. His administration has been wholly unsatisfactory. It is important that he be removed before other serious blunders are made."

Senator MUNDT told the Legionnaires that he had asked President Truman to appoint to the Subversive Activities Control Board at least one Legion-recommended two-fisted, sturdy American, coupling a realistic knowledge of communism with an active sense of fair play.

"If the President mans this effective new net for catching Communists with a crew that considers communism nothing more than a red herring, we shall never be able to catch and decapitate the great conspiratorial red octopus that is communism," he declared.

"The new Communist control bill," MUNDT said, "does not limit in any way the civil rights of all Americans," but in fact provides a forum in which anyone unjustly accused may clear himself publicly.

Urging more vigorous action against Communists who have insinuated themselves into the Government, MUNDT said that he once asked Jack Peurifoy, then Assistant Secretary of State, in charge of security, how many Communists were employed by the State Department. Peurifoy, he said, said that 205 known Communists or disloyal persons had been discharged.

"If I could be allowed to send 205 loyal, sturdy American Legionnaires into the Politburo in Moscow, I promise you that within 6 months, I would have old Joe Stalin walking around Red Square, waving the American flag and singing Yankee Doodle," he said.

The Legionnaires roared approval.

JAILING OF ALL REDS SOUGHT BY LEGION—OUTLAWING OF PARTY URGED—SENATOR MALONE BLASTS ACHESON

Communism and Secretary of State Dean Acheson were torn to shreds yesterday at the thirty-second annual national convention of the American Legion, as the delegates got down to brass tacks.

Their annual grand parade a thing of the past, the Legionnaires girded themselves militantly against America's Communists and America's foreign policy.

High lights of yesterday's session was a speech by United States Senator MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, who ripped into the Marshall plan, Secretary of State Acheson, and President Truman.

The other outstanding deevlopment of the convention was adoption of the Legion's Americanism committee report in toto.

BACKS RED JAILING

The report called for the jailing of members of the Communist Party and urged Congress to dissolve the party.

The report also demanded that the President and the Chairman of his Loyalty Commission continue their efforts in their work.

Senator MALONE, undoubtedly delivering the most dynamic speech of the convention, declared:

"The Legion's programs over the years have been given lip service by public officials and then were sidetracked, defeated, and nullified by the national administration. I will have no part of the administration's attempts, through the State Department, to control this organization's thinking and leadership in national defense and international affairs."

FOUGHT FOR UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

"Since I entered the Senate in 1947, I have fought for universal military training and an adequate preparedness program. Here again, the administration opposed the 70 air group appropriation and other adequate programs.

"American Legion officials have stated repeatedly their belief that, had a universal military training program been adopted, we would not have suffered the early severe setbacks in Korea with the accompanying loss of American lives and American prestige among nations. The boys who had to be sent into battle first should have had proper fundamental training and the most modern equipment."

CRACKPOT IDEAS

"Sending young men into battle without proper training and equipment is not war—it is murder," the Senator declared.

"The Korean situation might never have arisen in the first place, despite State Department bungling, if we had had a definite foreign policy and an adequate national defense organization, spearheaded by an air corps and a submarine fleet so that the nations of the world and the American people would know that we could enforce our commitments."

Senator MALONE termed the American foreign policy a "conglomeration of crackpot ideas." He said these ideas are the root of America's troubles today.

"There is no bipartisan foreign policy," he said, "and there never has been a bipartisan foreign policy. There has been a Truman-Acheson-Lattimore program, decided upon and settled in every instance before the Republicans of the Senate were even informed as to what was under consideration."

RAPS MARSHALL PLAN

At this juncture of his address Senator MALONE launched into a bitter denunciation of the Marshall plan.

"The administration forced the ECA down the throats of our taxpayers," he began. "Billions of dollars to Europe with no conditions attached. And for what? The United Nations Secretariat recently reported that, notwithstanding the billions of dollars poured into Europe by us, Europe's economic problem is not solved and the solution is not in sight.

"Our taxpayers' money has accomplished one thing—the renewal of 100-year-old feuds among the countries of Europe.

"Churchill has recently said that the European Marshall-plan countries are less able to defend themselves now than they were 3 years ago."

YOKE OF BONDAGE

The speaker told the delegates that ECA money could have been loaned to private business through the World Bank on the same terms that the RFC loans money to organizations and individuals in this country in times of stress.

"We should not give our taxpayers' money outright to any foreign governments, nor loan it to foreign private business on less stringent terms than a veteran can borrow it in this country," the Senator continued.

The speaker charged that American money is being used by the ECA in the Far East and Africa for the purpose of strengthening the "yoke of bondage and slavery and perpetuating misery among the primitive peoples ruled and worked by imperial overlords through the colonial system and for arming Russia and the iron curtain countries for a third world war."

ARMED BY ECA

"The Communist countries are being armed by ECA or Marshall-plan countries through trade treaties," the Senator charged.

"Metalworking tools, steel, ball bearings, electrical machinery and apparatus, grain mills, heavy road machinery, farm machinery, and motor vehicles are a few of the many thousands of items being sent to Russia's satellite countries from ECA nations," he explained.

The Senator said that we are helping Russia for war just as we helped Japan before World War II.

Turning to the Secretary of State, the Senator said:

"At a closed meeting of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Acheson was asked whether he had sought the views of General MacArthur on the strategic importance of Formosa. He answered that he was not reporting on MacArthur's views, that he did not necessarily know them. He also said he had not talked to the Joint Chiefs and did not know their views.

"Three days later, Acheson made the announcement that America's military defense line in the Pacific ran from the Aleutians to the Philippines, including Japan and Okinawa, but skipping Korea and Formosa. Undoubtedly," the Senator continued, "Stalin thought he had the nod of Acheson to go ahead. Everything points to that. But, Acheson's position on Korea was suddenly reversed and it may be presumed that he is now apologizing to the Hisses and his other Communist friends.

"Now, the President's trip to see MacArthur is fine, but it is 5 years late. We have given away China and Berlin.

"Our foreign policy has been both casual and improvised," the Senator went on. "Furthermore, the State Department is unwilling to tell the American people just what commitments have been made."

NOT EVEN CONSULTED

"As a matter of fact, it did not even tell General MacArthur that it had made commitments which might require a Korean campaign. Now, since the stupidity, or deliberate treachery, of the Asia policy exists, Hiss, Lattimore, and Acheson cannot be denied, the followers of this group have the unmitigated gall to spread the lying whisper that General MacArthur was responsible for the surprise attack on South Korea.

"General MacArthur, far from shaping any of the policy, was not even consulted," the Senator said.

"That handling of the Korean threat is but another instance proving the unfitness of Mr. Acheson for his high position. His administration has been wholly unsatisfactory. It is important that he be removed before other serious blunders are made."

RAPS REDS IN JOBS

The speaker then went into a condemnation of various Communists in Government departments, such as Lee Pressman, and continued:

"Until this country squarely faces its errors in foreign and domestic policy, until it abandons the spend-and-elect theories of welfare statism, until it abandons the one-economic-world Marxist program of free trade—and world distribution of our hard-earned wealth—we will continue to tremble before the threats of a people backward in production and culture.

"We need to remind ourselves that our first and foremost task is to keep ourselves strong. The anti-Communist forces of the world that are able and willing to fight are outnumbered."

WARNS OF DANGER

"The defense of the free world must be achieved by the quality of training and equipment which can overcome quantity. We are not big enough to overwhelm our opponents by the massing of military power. Since we cannot hope to be bigger our fate depends on whether we can be better trained and better equipped."

The Senator called for a housecleaning at home and warned of a real danger on the home front through Communists and Communist-front organizations.

"The American Legion must not let us down," Senator MALONE concluded.

Administration, Not Hoover, Made Reorganization Plans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, my press release for May 31, 1950, stating why I feel the administration and not the Hoover Commission is the designer of the reorganization plans.

There being no objection the remarks were ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 31, 1950.—The administration has deliberately misused the name of our only living former President, Herbert Hoover, in its grab for power, United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, charged today, referring to the reorganization plans which, as Senator MALONE pointed out, were prepared not by the Hoover Commission, but by the administration.

In calling attention to differences between Hoover Commission recommendations and the reorganization plans as submitted by the President, the Nevada Senator made this comment: "The administration has been successful in securing the support of some high-minded people and highly respected organizations only by labeling its reorganization plans 'the Hoover plans' and representing them as measures of efficiency and economy, while as a matter of fact some of them were perversions of Hoover Commission recommendations and obviously were submitted for the one purpose of increasing the power of the Executive."

Continuing, Senator MALONE said:

"We have gone a fearful distance on the road to centralization. It seems to me that we have reached a point where the only sensible yardstick to apply to any new legislation or proposal is this: Does it further centralize power in the Executive? If it does, then this fault is so grievous that it outweighs whatever may be good about it, because centralization of power causes the atrophying of those national traits that made us big, virile, and wealthy as a nation.

"Those of us who have observed close at hand the reckless spending, wanton waste, and hopeless inefficiency in which the Truman administration has reveled were at first surprised when it was reported that the administration favored the Hoover Commission recommendations. Had the administration at long last turned over a new leaf, or on the other hand was this another device to grab more power for the President? After reading some of the reorganization plans, we knew the answer.

"Senator SCOTT LUCAS, the majority leader, in supporting the reorganization plans, all of them, suggested that the Congress should give the President some leeway. We in the Senate have cause to suspect what the words, 'some leeway,' may mean to this administration.

"The Hoover Commission was created by efficiency-conscious and economy-conscious Republicans, in the Eightieth Congress; its report was adulterated by the Democrat administration."

Statement of Foreign Minister Mohammed Salah El-Din Bey, of Egypt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the best way to achieve a sounder basis of international amity is across the council table. That is why we welcome the visits to these shores of leaders of foreign governments.

The statement issued on the occasion of the recent visit here of the Foreign Minister of Egypt, His Excellency Mohammed Salah El-Din Bey, brings a constructive note from the strategically important Middle East.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement issued on the occasion of his visit to the United States.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF EGYPT, MOHAMMED SALAH EL-DIN BEY

As this is my first visit to America, I am happy to express my great admiration for the obvious signs of prosperity on all sides which makes this country a leader in the fields of industry, trade, and democratic practices. The original purpose of my visit was to attend the fifth meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations and to emphasize once more the deep interest Egypt has in the cause of peace and the successful cooperation between all nations. But I also have had the great pleasure of meeting several leaders in the political and economic life of the United States, and my interviews with them have been of great interest.

My visit to Washington has given me further insight into the life of this great democracy and has offered me the opportunity of meeting Mr. Acheson, with whom I have had a very frank and friendly exchange of views in matters concerning our two countries. I had also the pleasure of paying a courtesy visit to General Marshall, with whom I have had a very friendly and interesting talk.

I should like to take this opportunity to emphasize the basic principles of Egypt's foreign policy, which are:

1. To complete and safeguard Egyptian independence and implement the unity of Egypt and the Sudan.

2. To live on friendly terms with all nations.

3. To help the world-wide movement to establish peace and security.

4. To play her part, together with other democracies, in bringing about general stability and understanding between the nations.

There is no doubt that Egypt would be better able to play her part in the international field if her own political problems could be successfully resolved. I am here referring to the question of the British occupation of the Suez Canal Zone and the difficulties which still stand in the way of unity between Egypt and the Sudan under the Egyptian Crown. We hoped that these problems might be solved through friendly negotiations, as their solution in Egypt's favor is essential for the sake of stability and peace in the Middle East.

I need not point out the importance of Egypt's strategic position, her economic resources, her plentiful manpower, and her great value as a stabilizing influence, not only in the Middle East, but in the world as a whole. I hope that my present visit to America, and the opportunity it has afforded me in establishing friendly contacts and sympathetic understanding with your public men, will eventually remove all obstacles and help to realize the full cooperation of Egypt as a member of the United Nations in upholding the cause of democracy and peace in this troubled world.

Washington Unconcerned About Taxpayers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a press and radio release dated July 25, 1950, concerning the fact that Washington seems unconcerned with the position of the American taxpayer.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, said today in the Senate that Washington seems unconcerned with the position of the American taxpayer. The Nevada Senator made this statement in a speech in which he pointed out ways to raise the money for the expanded military program without raising taxes.

Senator MALONE said that the only program understood in Washington seems to be: "Spend, spend, spend, save nothing, boost the withholding taxes, boost all the taxes, give no thought to the American taxpayer."

The Senator said that the American taxpayer should not have to bear the burden of building up Europe's peacetime industries and carrying on a domestic peacetime public works program while also carrying the load of a war. He asked, "Are the Members of this body interested in saving any money for the taxpayers in their respective States?"

"In the new budget," Senator MALONE said, "there is an item of $500,000,000 for peacetime public works. In wartime, such works are unnecessary and, in fact, undesirable. Our money and our manhours should be devoted to the war effort. This $500,000,000 should be transferred to the military program."

For a saving of an additional $3,500,000,000, Senator MALONE suggested that 20 percent be cut from the civil government budget. He pointed out that of the total budget of $42,000,000,000 for the new fiscal year, $25,000,000,000 are for national defense, veterans' services and benefits, and interest on the public debt, leaving $17,000,000,000 for the civil government, and he said that this item could easily stand a 20-percent cut, a saving of approximately $3,500,000,000.

Senator MALONE said: "This $3,500,000,000, plus the $500,000,000 for peacetime public works, plus the $3,000,000,000 which can be saved by stopping ECA, a peacetime endeavor, plus the $1,000,000,000 which would be available by combining the military-assistance program with our own military program, makes $8,000,000,000 for the military program. That is a good start, and by following this suggestion of saving we need not now load down our taxpayers with additional burdens."

Extending Free Trade on Copper Plot To Weaken United States Economic Structure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my press release for July 31, 1950, giving my reasons for saying that the extension of the free trade on copper is part of the conspiracy to weaken the economic structure of the country.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 31, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged today that the extension of the free trade on copper is part of the conspiracy to weaken the economic structure of the country. The Nevada Senator referred to his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee against House Joint Resolution 502, which would resuspend the import tax on copper. In that testimony he strenuously objected to the resolution, and he proposes that if the resolution comes to the Senate floor he will debate it at some length.

"Those Red sympathizers in our midst who are plotting against the American system," said Senator MALONE, "are happy to see 70 percent of our mines closed in time of war, as this means a weakening of our productive structure." The tariff or import fee is a national defense measure, applying to practically all products, but especially to the strategic and critical minerals and materials, of which copper is an important part. An import fee has the effect of encouraging venture capital by establishing a floor under wages and investments.

"When the 4-cent tariff on copper was reduced, every independent copper mine in the United States was closed, with the exception of one in the State of Michigan, which had to lower wages and write off investments to meet competition.

"The major copper-producing companies are using the brass fabricators as a front to lobby for free trade on copper, while at the same time manufactured brass products have a tariff up to 65 percent, sufficient to meet American wage standards.

"This is the first time in our history that the head of a foreign nation has come to Washington to lobby for legislation. The President of Chile is to be commended for looking out for the best interests of Chileans. American officials should be equally concerned for the best interests of Americans. A strong America is necessary to win a war.

"Our strongest weapon is productivity, which the enemy is attacking from within. With no import fee to protect American workers and investors, no venture capital will be available to go into business, to go into mining, and no new mineral deposits will be found.

"The excuse used by the free-trade plotters to the effect that an import fee would keep out copper and hurt our war effort is absurd on its face for the simple reason that the Government does not pay tariff, and any such import fee paid the Government by a private manufacturer is charged back to the Government in the product.

"From the evidence and from the attitude of the free-trade proponents, the conclusion is inescapable that this is part of a gigantic scheme designed to undermine the American economic system. Well-meaning folks who favor the free-trade policy are unmindful of the danger to the American workers and to America's national defense, and are being used as dupes by the clever enemies within our own Government."

The November Elections—Mr. Morley Has a Point

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two editorials from the Catholic Review of Baltimore, Md., for Friday, October 13, 1950. The first is an editorial by J. J. Gilbert entitled "The November Elections" and the second is an editorial entitled "Mr. Morley Has a Point."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NOVEMBER ELECTIONS: IMPORTANT BECAUSE THEY WILL CHARACTERIZE THE NEXT CONGRESS

(By J. J. Gilbert)

It is beginning to become apparent in Washington that the votes which the citizens of the United States cast in the coming November elections will be of a particular importance.

This is so because informed persons believe that the coming winter will be a period of intense political activity, and one in which the people of the United States will be subjected to an impressive barrage of propaganda from both within and without the country. The elections afford the people an opportunity to express definitely the opinions they want represented in Congress. In fact, they will elect all of the House of Representatives and 32 Senators. The complexion of the Congress for the next 2 years will have a heavy bearing upon the outcome of the Presidential election in 1952.

The elections are of particular importance because the Congress that is elected to serve for the next 2 years probably will be called upon to make decisions that will affect the American way of life for many years to come.

Just before the second session of the Eighty-first Congress recessed, it enacted over President Truman's veto a strict antisubversive law which it felt the people wanted. The lawmakers were going back to stand for election before their constituents, and they felt called upon to override the President's opposition. Warning already has been given that a vigorous drive will be made to water down the "Red curb" bill when Congress reconvenes. The people, by their votes, are expected to instruct and encourage their representatives in Congress as to their wishes in this matter.

An impression has been created in some quarters that the antisubversive law has put the Communists in this country on the run. There is nothing to justify this belief. One hears as much propaganda favorable to Red plans as heretofore, whether those who spread the propaganda do so wittingly or not.

The next Congress is likely to have to pass upon the peace that is made in Korea, assuming our success at arms continues there.

President Truman already is claiming that attempts will be made in the next Congress to block the Nation's defense program that he has launched. Part of the President's explanation of this prediction is the fact that after both World War I and World War II, Americans pressed to do away with the draft, to reduce arms expenditures, and cut taxes. He says, too, that it was sought to block preparedness in the current session of Congress.

It seems likely that the defense program will get at least some consideration in the next Congress, because the really heavy tax "bite" has been deferred until after the November voting, and the Secretary of the Treasury has warned that the increases—to be long enduring—will be very heavy.

The next Congress may have to ratify the peace treaty with Japan and make very important decisions as to how much longer we will wait for Russian cooperation before taking other international decisions without her.

The new Congress is going to have to make many more decisions along this and other lines. Many of these measures will tend to centralize power in the Government and edge us toward Federal control. It will be the duty of Congress toward the people to safeguard again against these steps becoming permanent policy.

MR. MORLEY HAS A POINT

Felix Morley, who is best known to the American public as a news analyst, spoke to the Maryland Action Guild last Monday night—and it would be accurate if colloquial to remark that he uttered a mouthful. The former college head, editor and observer, spoke about the bipartisan complexion of the State Department, and remarked that in his opinion, it was just about bipartisan enough to discourage criticism. Or at least, this was the motivation. Certainly if this complexion turned away any wrath, it did not plug up more than a tiny few channels of criticism. But it may have discouraged some otherwise outspoken critics.

Mr. Morley seemed convinced, as do many other Americans on the outside looking in, that Mr. Acheson, with administrative reassurances and impulsions, is steadily working up to an arrangement for permitting if not actively endorsing the United Nations recognition of Communist China. The appeasement pattern evidently has not been torn up in the State Department possibly for two reasons. They are to keep the red Chinese hoping and thus out of Korea, and to go along with Great Britain in the recognition and possibly, but not probably wean them away from Russian domination by emphasizing Russia's proclivity for starting wars with satellites and then letting them bite the dust when they are beaten.

Another of Mr. Morley's nuggets during his address was his admonition to voters. He pointed to the coming November elections as the only means enjoyed by the American citizen to thwart any deals with Communists by voting for candidates committed to battle Communists within and without and to tolerate no compromise with them.

It should be added, perhaps, that, keeping this advice in mind, voters also might do an excellent service to America by electing men who will not stand for paring down the anti-subversive law even during the howling and clamoring from those who must enforce it.

Senate Joint Resolution 151, To Prohibit Financial Aid to Any Foreign Country Engaging in Trade With Russia, Her Satellite Countries, or Any Other Area Dominated or Controlled by Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of Senate Joint Resolution 151 to prohibit financial aid to any foreign country engaging in trade with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other area dominated or controlled by Russia. This bill was introduced on January 24, 1950, by the junior Senator from Nevada, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, where it is now pending.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 151

Joint resolution to prohibit financial aid to any foreign country engaging in trade with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other area dominated or controlled by Russia

Whereas one of the alleged basic purposes of the Marshall plan is the restoration or maintenance in European countries of principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence through a joint program based upon self-help and mutual cooperation; and

Whereas Russia and other Communist dominated and controlled countries and areas have refused to participate in such joint program; and

Whereas Communist actions have endangered world peace; and

Whereas certain participating nations under the Marshall plan by trading with Russia and other Communist dominated and controlled countries and areas and through nonaggression pacts and treaties are violating the basic principles of the Marshall plan and are aiding and fostering communism in other areas of the world through furnishing the necessary equipment, machinery, and supplies to consolidate Communist gains in eastern Europe and in Asia; and

Whereas such nations are furnishing Russia and the Communist areas necessary equipment, machinery, and supplies for world war III; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Congress and the basic policy of the Marshall plan and its enabling legislation that assistance to any participating country which fails in any way to meet its obligation to sustain and strengthen the principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence, through cooperating with such Communist nations and areas, should be terminated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That on and after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution no financial aid shall be given by the United States or any agency or officer thereof (whether by loan, grant, lend-lease, or in an, other manner) to any foreign country which engages in trade or commerce on or after such date with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other Communist dominated or controlled area in any other country.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that no moneys shall hereafter be appropriated and no loans shall hereafter be made and no equipment or supplies of any kind shall be furnished to any nation engaging in such trade or commerce or permitting its nationals to do so.

Lack of Training Adds to Combat Losses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Salt Lake Telegram, of August 22, 1950, relative to the danger to untrained soldiers in Korea.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LACK OF TRAINING DOES ADD TO COMBAT LOSSES

Senator MALONE, of Nevada, told the United States Senate the other day that this country is "murdering" American boys by putting them into combat in Korea without adequate training. The Senator said many of the boys being rushed into battle were "green" and that they therefore "had no chance to survive." He was arguing for universal military training, which he said the American Legion and other groups had been advocating for 25 years.

The Senator's language may be a bit too strong, yet there is no question that the inadequately trained soldier is far more apt to stop a bullet than the one who has been carefully prepared to face the emergencies of combat and to take care of himself.

Half-trained troops do make themselves far too conspicuous targets. They do not have the discipline which helps them to fight not only courageously but wisely and shrewdly. While a universal military training program will not guarantee us against war losses, it will keep those losses to a minimum by assuring that green troops will not have to get their training in the hard, and all too often deadly, school of actual combat.

Incidentally, there are no political aspects to Senator MALONE's advocacy of universal training. He is a Republican, but the program has the wholehearted support of President Truman. In fact, the issue of whether or not we should have such training cuts straight across party lines. It is not a partisan question and, of course, any issue involving the lives of our American youth should not be.

Tungsten in Korea—World's Tungsten Supply—Socialization of American Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by S. H. Williston, of California, an expert in the tungsten business, outlining tungsten in Korea, the world's tungsten supply, and socialization of American industry.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TUNGSTEN IN KOREA

The ECA was able to complete its expenditures of some half million dollars or more on the rejuvenation and rehabilitation of one of the world's largest tungsten mines in South Korea just before the North Koreans captured the property on the first day of the Korean incident. American know-how and American taxpayers' money solved a rather difficult metallurgical problem and had the property going in tiptop shape at the time of the invasion. One thousand tons of concentrates were also available for the Russian war effort upon the capture of the mine. The mine was located less than a score of miles from the thirty-eighth parallel.

THE WORLD'S TUNGSTEN SUPPLY

Prior to the conquest of China by the Communists, Russia's proportion of world tungsten producing capacity was negligible. At the present time Russian-controlled tungsten producing capacity is something close to two-thirds of the world's total, leaving only one-third available for the United States and all of the democratic countries. The United States alone for purely commercial uses normally requires 25 percent of the world's capacity to produce. The democracies of Europe normally take another 25 percent. Normal commercial requirements for peacetime uses alone are greater than the world's productive capacity under the control of the democratic nations. It is manifestly impossible to get 50 percent of the world's production from 35 percent of the world's capacity to produce.

It is interesting to note that reliable sources of information indicate that Russia is paying China for tungsten in gold, at a price almost twice as high as the United States market.

Just where tungsten for jet engines, tungsten carbide tools and steel alloys is going to come from is difficult to foresee, and what will happen to the program for tungsten carbide cored tank-killer ammunition is even more difficult to foresee.

SOCIALIZATION OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY

In England many industries have been taken over by the British Government and since they usually show losses, the British Government pays the losses. The socialization system in the United States is considerably superior. In any new corporate venture in industrial production the Government tax is some 45 percent of the corporate profits, and then if it is a successful venture, roughly 50 percent of what remains. This adds up to a 72½ percent carried interest in the operation. Since all of the profits are taxed and few of the losses are allowed, I think everyone will agree that a 72½ percent carried interest is far better for the Government than owning the industries outright. It does seem, however, a little selfish of the Treasury to want to add an excess profits tax which would make the Government's carried interest even larger. When proposed renegotiation of raw materials is added to this it would seem that the profit motive has been completely eliminated in a country that in the past has boasted of its ability to produce under the capitalistic system.

While Russia has abandoned the basic Marxist theory of communism and now rewards her producers in accordance with their production, we in America, through our tax policies, seem to have adopted in toto the theory of "from each according to his ability; to each according to his needs." This is translated in Washington bureaucratese as cost plus fixed fee.

Statement of Hon. Herbert Hoover to the American Society of Mechanical Engineers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, in critical times like these, the sage advice of former President Herbert Hoover on the exercise of the right of suffrage is worth the attention of every American. Totalitarian governments grow on the apathy of the voter. Inefficiency in government thrives on the failure of voters to go to the polls. Boss governments grow fat and ruthless when voters fail to take an active part in the business of running the country.

Vote, and preserve democracy.

Mr. President I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a time of many crises. Some of them reach deeper than even war.

The ballot is the foundation of our representative Government where individual rights are cemented as from the Creator and not from the state.

The necessary lubricant of the machinery of such Government is the two-major-party political system where the voter may have a choice of policies and representatives.

Only 66,811,000 persons, registered or otherwise qualified themselves to vote in 1948 out of the 94,072,000 persons over 21 years of age. Of these, only 48,834,000 persons actually voted.

There are over 20,000,000 citizens who either have employment or direct benefits from the Government. With their wives they constitute a potential of over half of the registered voters. They usually vote. They may vote in the interest of the whole people. But a system of checks and balances must be maintained.

If you do not vote, you have no right to complain. But far worse, you have abandoned the whole American system.

At a time of world crises when this country stands as a great bulwark of freedom against the forces of totalitarianism, Americans are in serious danger of losing their priceless heritage of liberty within these shores through the shocking indifference of a substantial portion of our electorate.

The American Society of Mechanical Engineers makes a nonpartisan appeal to its members and to all engineers to perform their first duty as citizens—to vote. The ASME asks the engineer to exercise his civic responsibility with the same devotion with which he discharges the high purposes of his profession. It asks all Americans to vote.

American blood is being shed for freedom overseas. Do not let democracy at home go by default.

British Firms Deal With Reds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial by Jonathan Stout, appearing in the New Leader of September 2, 1950, entitled "British Firms Deal With Reds."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH FIRMS DEAL WITH REDS

(By Jonathan Stout)

British businessmen in Hong Kong are making their lushest postwar profits selling railroad and bridge-building equipment to the Chinese Communists, although they know that some of the equipment is going to the North Koreans and the rest is being used by Peking to build up its military transportation system.

Both Washington and London know what is going on, but neither has made a move to halt this lucrative trade with a government whose troops may shortly be fighting openly in Korea against American and British soldiers. The matter remains a hush-hush subject at the State Department, which has not even broached the affair to Downing Street as yet. Inquiries at the Department have encountered only official frowns, and American military heads in the Far East are reported incensed at the Department's failure to take steps to protect the lives of our GI's in Korea.

A few months ago—and, indeed, up to the eve of the North Korean attack, as originally revealed in the New Leader—the State Department was fighting for permission for Peking to obtain railroad equipment from American-occupied Japan and western Germany. This was finally prevented by the Defense Department's spirited protest. Now that the Chinese Communists are procuring the equipment through the British, the State Department is enjoying the final triumph over the Pentagon and is not bestirring itself to take any corrective measures.

This story spotlights only a small part of the fierce struggle now in progress between Defense Secretary Louis Johnson and Secretary of State Dean Acheson. General MacArthur and the ECA are also involved. Acheson is fighting both Johnson and MacArthur, and Johnson is squared off against Acheson and the ECA.

The Defense Department is the one responsible for withholding export licenses for millions of dollars worth of machinery, steel mills, and oil-refining equipment manufactured in this country under ECA authorizations and destined for companies in western Europe which are either wholly Russian-owned or are shipping their output to the Soviet bloc.

The Department has been forced to rely wholly on its own intelligence service in checking on European firms ordering war-potential equipment from American manufacturers under ERP. It has uncovered a network of companies, in Marshall-plan countries, completely owned by the Soviet Government through secret agents and producing exclusively for export to the U. S. S. R. Other firms, though not under Soviet ownership, are under contract to produce only for the Russians. In every such case discovered by the Defense Department, protests by the military have blocked issuance of export licenses. The American manufacturers have already been paid by the ECA, so they stand to lose nothing but the storage charges incurred while they hold the equipment.

The secrecy surrounding the whole situation began to crack last week when it was revealed that a British firm had transshipped to Russia 50 tons of American-produced molybdenum—an alloy used for hardening steel. Another 150 tons of molybdenum scheduled for shipment to the Soviet Union was seized in London and is being held there. United States authorities are investigating whether the British firm in question is one secretly owned by the Soviet Government or merely under contract to the Russians.

The lid was pried a little further off later in the week when Winston Churchill revealed that the head of Craven Bros. in Stockport, Britain's second largest machine-tool firm, had informed me that he had for more than 2 years asked the British Government whether he should fulfill contracts for making machine tools for Soviet Russia, particularly of the class required for the manufacture and repair of tanks, when so many of our own royal ordnance factories are in sore need of renovation for this very purpose.

"The Craven Co.'s head," Churchill said, "told me his highly skilled craftsmen were seriously disturbed at doing work for Soviet Russian satellite Poland, which they feared would weaken our country and strengthen its most likely assailant. They also did not like the presence of Russian Government inspectors under present conditions inside their workshops where a lot of confidential production is also being done for His Majesty's Government."

A spokesman of the British Ministry of Supply commented later, "It is quite true that several machine-tool manufacturers, including Craven Bros., are fulfilling contracts for Russia."

That is the picture as it obtains today in this country and in western Europe. In the face of these conditions, the efforts of the Defense Department to enforce the embargo against the shipment of war-potential equipment to the Soviet bloc have been described to this reporter as trying to plug the leaks in a sieve.

Defense of States' Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a news dispatch which appeared in the Reno Evening Gazette of September 23, 1950, relative to the defense of States' rights by the junior Senator of Nevada.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MALONE EXPLAINS HIS STAND ON SLOTS MEASURE

Senate GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, will continue his "vigilance in the Senate on the premise that any State possess the sovereign right to legislate within the framework of Federal Constitution," he reported from Washington today.

Senator MALONE, who completed nearly 12 hours of extended debate Friday, emphasized that contrary to reports of his action on the Senate floor, his stand was on the question of whether or not the Senate should approve a conference report on a bill he said "obviously circumvents the right of a State legislature to pass any legislation that does not contravene the Constitution of the United States, and not on the question of whether or not gambling should be legal."

During his one-man stand, Senator MALONE continually accentuated that he was not a member of the Nevada State Legislature, that it was not his business to interfere with its functions and that he merely abided by the laws of that body which represents the opinions of the people of Nevada.

The Senator stated, "I am trying to protect a State in its authority to carry out the wishes of a majority of its people, and will continue to do so regardless whether it is my State or any other State.

"I am not in any way attempting to interfere with the pressing business before the Senate. At any time I will gladly yield for such business that will speed up the work of the Senate. But, I cannot concede if it will mean the usurping of the sovereign rights of the people of these United States."

The bill under debate would require the legislature of a State, where gambling devices are legal to enact a law exempting that State from the provisions of the bill. Once the State law was enacted such devices could be shipped into the State by the manufacturer. However, the machines could not be shipped back for repairs since all major slot-machine manufacturers are located in Illinois where their use is illegal.

In continuing his stand, Senator MALONE stated "The final result of this law, if approved, will be the nullification of an act of a State's legislature representing the people. The point has been made in the Senate many times on other occasions. And I approve of the position thus taken—that the Federal Government has continued to encroach upon the States over the past years until, if continued, it will eventually absorb the function of a State.

"This development has been accelerated greatly in the past 15 or 20 years, until the right of a State to handle its own business has been severely curtailed. The situation in that respect now is becoming very dangerous."

United States Leads for German Cutlery Import

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a dispatch from the June 26, 1950, issue of the Journal of Commerce concerning the United States leading the foreign markets for west German cutlery.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES LEADS FOREIGN MARKETS FOR WEST GERMAN CUTLERY

SOLINGEN.—The United States is now the leading market for west German exports of cutlery, scissors, razors, penknives, and similar cutting implements, followed by Canada, Switzerland, and Belgium in that order, according to industry observers here.

The industry—which is concentrated almost exclusively in the Solingen area—was able to double its exports in the first quarter of this year to a value of DM 9,930,000 from DM 4,052,000 in the first 3 months of 1949. Total exports last year had a value of DM 20,950,000—which represented a threefold increase on the 1948 figure of DM 6,670,000.

SEVENTY PERCENT OF PREWAR VOLUME

In the terms of value, 1949 shipments reached approximately 70 percent of the prewar level (1938 exports were worth 31,100,000 Reichsmarks); but, in view of the increases in prices during the intervening period, the actual volume of exports during 1949 is estimated to have been equal only to about one-third of prewar. Moreover, exports accounted for about 40 percent of the total production prior to 1939, whereas only 15 to 18 percent are sold on foreign markets at the present time.

Sales to soft-currency countries are still severely handicapped by a reluctance to grant import licenses on a large scale. Scandinavian countries, in particular, which used to be important outlets in prewar days, are issuing licenses very sparingly but Turkey has recently issued import licenses for $150,000. Home market sales have been at low ebb following a seasonal spurt last Christmas.

SPECIALTIES LEAD

Foreign demand is concentrated largely on specialties, with only minor emphasis on staple lines, in which the United States, Britain, and Italy are strong competitors. Absence of import licenses is regarded as the main obstacle to a further rapid expansion of sales.

The relatively favorable development of exports to dollar countries has caused a number of manufacturers to lower their dollar prices with a view to increasing turn-over. The Export Committee of the Solingen Chamber of Commerce and Industry points out that such price reductions should aim primarily at preserving a competitive position and should not be made unnecessarily. Industry circles are of the opinion that German export prices, on the whole, compare well with foreign quotations, though strong competition is being met in cutlery from Belgian, Dutch, and Swiss manufacturers. Argentina and Brazil are also able to supply cutlery of above-average quality, though in different shapes than are being made by German firms.

German exporters are doing a fair volume of business with Central and South America in high-quality razor blades, but are unable to compete with United States producers in the lower price brackets.

Exports of penknives have benefited from an expansion of assortments effected recently by most manufacturers. However, the large range of products now being made has added to costs and prevents rationalization of production. German quotations for penknives are said to be fully competitive with United States, British, and Italian price levels.

Our Flag To Stop Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, recently I received an article written by a lady who lost her son as a result of an illness incurred during and because of his military service. This lady is Mrs. Vivian Boyer Ropes, who is well known as an aviatrix of great ability. Her son's dying wish was that his mother tour the earth in an effort to bring peace and order to our troubled world.

Mrs. Ropes made that trip and I ask that its result be reprinted here in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am sure that those who read it will find that it is a most thoughtful and earnest approach to solving—to a degree at least—the difficulties of international relations.

The article follows:

OUR FLAG TO STOP COMMUNISM

SEPTEMBER 14, 1950.

Upon touring the world and talking with people of all countries and in the many contacts made while riding in busses instead of taxicabs, trams, and trains, I have discovered that in many of the small villages, especially in Italy, communism is flourishing and all because they do not know that America has been sending many goods to their country for them.

I traveled through these little villages giving the children candy and the men cigarettes, telling them it was given to them by America. Women with children in their arms with whom I talked and gave candy, were very much surprised, and said it was the first thing they had ever received from America. That immediately started me thinking and asking questions, such as: "Is your husband a Communist?" There were 8 answers of "yes" out of every 10. I wrote the letters "U. S. A." on a piece of paper and asked if they had ever received anything with that stamp on it or did they know what it meant; not one of those questioned knew, including men, women, and children. This reaction prompted me to draw the American flag, putting in all the stars. This I showed them and asked if they recognized the flag; believe it or not, women, men, and children recognized it and said "Yes, that is the American flag."

The women in that little town told me that they did without food in order to buy pencils and paper so that they could send their children to school. They wanted them to learn very much, so as not to go through the hardships that are caused by ignorance. I felt right then and there that if we Americans would send paper and pencils to those little villages, not with U. S. A. stamped on it, but a picture of the American flag on top of each and every pencil and pad, it would do more to wipe out communism than any form of propaganda we could think of. One of the best ways of wiping out communism, in my opinion, is to start with the children. If a child knows what country is helping it there will be no doubt in its mind when it grows up. And no matter how ignorant or uneducated the people in these countries are, there is one thing that they will always be able to recognize, that is, the good, old American flag. Through the experience of my world tour, including 12 countries in Europe, the only solution for wiping out communism, I find is this:

1. Instead of U. S. A., all materials, regardless of nature, should have the American flag on each and every article, regardless of size.

2. All stamps of American flags should be stamped on the left side or in the same place on each article, so that if there is any dispute of the flag being removed we can easily identify it as having come from the United States by pointing out the scar on each and every article.

3. Every stamp of the American flag should be put on any article going to countries outside the continental United States or any other country to which we send charity.

4. All loans made to any country should be stamped with the American flag, not to make sure the country knows where it came from, but so that in the event the paper is lost or finds its way into the hands of a Communist, whether able to read or not, there would be no doubt of its origin.

5. All articles bought in foreign countries with American loan money, should also be stamped with the American flag, so that there would be no doubt as to who was giving the country the gifts. I say this because much money has been loaned to foreign countries and with that money Communists have bought food for the poor, making them believe that the Communist is the benefactor. This, I feel, is the only way that our articles, and our charity for all will be known throughout the world. Subsequently, there would be no argument as to where it came from, if they could see the American flag.

The American flag is our only solution to wipe out communism, which seems to flourish among the ignorant. I know that I would have been very happy upon numerous occasions, if I would have been able to prove to these many people I talked to, many of whom were Communists, that many of the articles they received were in reality gifts from the United States.

6. The American flag stamped on our goods that have been given to charity, falling into the hands of black-market dealers, would prevent these dealers from selling the articles which were meant as gifts to the poor.

The American flag on any article would immediately inform the people that this was an American gift.

I think it is time that the United States used the flag for more than just a parade, as it will in time be used to save our country. Our flag was made for the people that could not read or write, so whenever our forefathers saw it, they knew it represented their country. Because even they, when our flag was first made could not read the words United States of America, the only thing they understood was the good old American flag.

Hoffman Proposes $150,000,000,000 for Peace Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the September 21, 1950, Washington Post, on Hoffman's proposal that the United States spend $150,000,000,000 in the fight for peace.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOFFMAN PROPOSES UNITED STATES SPEND $150,000,000,000 IN FIGHT FOR PEACE

(By Sam Stavisky)

A fight for peace, waged with the same vigor that the free world waged war, was proposed yesterday by ECA Administrator Paul G. Hoffman.

To 15 foreign editors visiting this country under auspices of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Hoffman outlined a five-point program, made up in its essentials of policies already in operation, in varying degrees.

The military phases of this program, he told the group, would cost the American people forty to fifty billion dollars a year for the next 3 years, in order to lift the Nation to an appropriate level of strength. His whole program included steps to:

MUST AUGMENT FORCES

1. Prevent the Kremlin from going to war by amassing sufficient military strength in the United States and the Nations of the free world.

"This is a tough assignment," Hoffman said, "one which the free world cannot readily carry out."

For the United States to do its share on the military front, Hoffman estimated, it would take a military budget of forty to fifty billion dollars for the next 3 years to bring our Nation up to full strength. The other free nations would have to make a proportionate financial sacrifice.

2. Help build up the economic strength of the countries threatened by communism.

"We must give the people in these countries something to live for and something to fight for," Hoffman declared.

3. Strengthen the democratic institutions and processes of the nations of the free world.

4. Hold out hope for the people of Russia and her satellites that they, too, may some day join the free world.

Hoffman estimated that 80 percent of the people in Russia and Communist-dominated countries could be eventually reached on this front.

5. Make the people of the world understand, through "truthful propaganda," that the democratic way of life is the best way of life.

"The Kremlin has outsmarted us and outspent us on the information front," Hoffman said. In France, he said, the Communists spent 15 times as much fighting the Marshall plan as this country did to put it over.

To skeptics who might ask: "Why should Russia wait until the free world gets strong enough to contain the Kremlin?" Hoffman replies there is no certain answer to such a question. He stressed, however, that the free world could have a reasonable hope that Russia would not go to war now or in the near future for several reasons:

1. The United States has better atom bombs and more of them.

2. The Korean war has shown Russia that it can't take western Europe through a coup, but would have to engage in a long, hard war to do so.

3. The Kremlin fears that its troops might become contaminated by western ideas and ways should Russia send its 300 divisions into a general war with the free world.

Hoffman said he had it from reliable authority that "contamination" of Russian troops has been a serious trouble wherever they have come in contact with the free countries.

It is his belief, Hoffman said, that this is the most potent of all reasons as to why Russia would prefer to avoid risking a general war.

The ECA chief also attempted to answer what he called another $64 question on the part of those who would take a skeptical view toward his containment proposal. This view is summed up in the following question: "Assuming the Western World can successfully contain Russia while averting war, what's to be done about Communist Russia's attitude toward the free democracies?"

Hoffman replied to his own question that he doesn't quite know the answer to this one, but that he believes if Russia can be contained long enough, and if the West can keep throwing the Kremlin off balance as it has with the Marshall plan and the United Nations' action on Korea, the people inside Russia will themselves change the government.

So long as the free world contains Russia an eventual split can be expected among the leaders of the Kremlin, Hoffman said, and a revolt can eventually be expected among the people.

"The collapse of the Kremlin rulers will come before the end of the present decade," Hoffman predicted, "if we wage peace on all fronts."

It is not too much to hope for a new Russian Government, a non-Communist government, that can participate in a free world at peace by 1960 he said.

The ECA Administrator emphasized there was nothing official or formal about his proposal. It's something he evolved during 30 days of hospitalization following a recent operation, Hoffman disclosed. He was not permitted to read while he was bedridden, so he dwelt on the possibilities of averting a third world war and attaining peace for the world. He spoke to the journalists at a luncheon in the Carlton Hotel.

Address of Hon. William Benton, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a radio talk I made over Station WTIC on Tuesday evening, October 10, 1950. This is the first of four major addresses which I propose to make over the radio during the coming days of the campaign.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I've chosen radio as the best vehicle for saying the most important things I want to say in this campaign. I want to talk to you in your own homes. My opponent says political campaigns are dull. He has hired the Brooklyn Dodgers band to relieve his tedium. The Republicans seem to be hoping this campaign will be dull enough to keep the voters at home on election day. They count on the apathy—in this year of world crisis—which has so often elected them in Connecticut in so-called off years, when there is no presidential campaign.

If you had been with me in Washington this year I know you'd have discovered that the issues in this campaign are no ordinary issues—but can indeed become a matter of life and death to all of us and to our children. I am therefore going to ask you to stay with me tonight for some straight, serious talk—with no folk dancing and no time for the Whiffenpoofs or Sweet Adeline. In the four major broadcasts I am planning on this station I shall talk about the gravest problem any American generation has ever faced—the problem of whether we can in fact hope to achieve peace of mind and quiet of soul.

The future holds terrifying possibilities of tragedy, but it holds hope, too. Which of the two we achieve will be decided not by blind fate but by the courage and wisdom of our leaders and of the entire American people. Every one of us must sense the fateful nature of the decisions which have to be taken in the next 2 years—war or peace—death or survival—a great forward surge for humanity, or a turning back to reaction and inertia.

Here in Connecticut, for the first time we choose a governor for a 4-year term. The State has a clear choice: whether to move forward under the new and progressive pattern of administration launched by Governor Bowles, or backward to an older era. Our State government affects every one of you—and not only your taxes and housing—but the education of your children and your own comfort and welfare in sickness, unemployment, and old-age. Governor Bowles in his 2 years in office has set an unrivaled record for progress in these areas of State administration. He is the leader of a strong and experienced and capable State ticket. Your choice this November will determine the shape of Connecticut's government for years to come. Here the issue revolves in major degree around the return to office of one man—one of the finest and most public-spirited men I have ever known, Gov. Chester Bowles. Nothing is more disturbing in this campaign than the innuendoes and vicious attacks being leveled at Governor Bowles. I've known him 25 years. They are lies. They remind me only of the stories spread everywhere about President Roosevelt. They are fostered by the same bitter die-hards—then as now—who through prejudice and ignorance oppose the great legislative measures for the welfare of the people.

In the election for national offices—your Senators and Representatives in Congress—the issue is one of principles and of national policies even more than of men. The significant thing is not merely whether Senator MCMAHON and I, and our associates who are Democratic candidates for the House, are to be the spokesmen for Connecticut. The question is also whether the leadership in the Congress of the United States—in this, one of the most critical moments of history—is to remain in experienced hands or to be turned over to a strangely assorted group not remotely equipped to provide the leadership the times require. In foreign affairs, the Republican Party includes powerful Senators and Congressmen who want to return to isolationism, and other vocal men who seem prepared for reckless adventures in the Far East. In domestic affairs many of the Republican Party's most influential figures would like to head the country back to the McKinley era, if they thought they could get away with it—and if they get control then they will say they have a "mandate" to get away with it.

The Senate elections in Connecticut are a prime target for this Republican group. That's why so much money is being poured into the State, from Wall Street and from elsewhere. The Republicans only need seven more seats to control the Senate. They already count on four or five and they figure the two from Connecticut as possibilities. Yes, around these two Connecticut Senate seats may revolve the control of the United States Senate—and United States and world policy.

Up to a year ago I was listed as an Independent. Hard, tough thought—not political partisanship—had led me to support the Democratic candidates in six successive Presidential elections. And believe me it has been hard, independent thought, plus some bitter and eye-opening experiences in Washington with some of the key men who control Republican politics, that led me to this speech tonight and the three to follow.

Let me set forth my personal and political creed as simply as I can, in five points. Basic to those five points is my faith that the good of all—the common good—is a means to the enduring happiness of every individual in society and is superior to the economic interest of any private group, not only in war but in peace as well.

First, I believe in freedom as the way to the common good—and in freedom of speech, of conscience and of religion as the basis of all other freedoms. The greatest threat to the common good today is communism, because it corrupts the common good, and denies that freedom is the way to reach it. If communism prevails throughout the rest of the world we in the United States can quickly find ourselves marching, our freedoms gone, in a Red goose-step, toward a common evil.

Second, I decry the cynicism that operates on the thesis that war can never be banished from the world. I deny the theory of a preventive war, which is justified as a kind of radical surgery—but which might readily kill the alleged doctor along with the alleged patient.

Today we and our friends must build our economic strength to discourage Communist aggression, as well as to serve the common good. We must also build our military strength rapidly, but we must recognize that force is no substitute for the great moral strength of which we must learn to be capable. The free peoples cannot win through this crisis by material means alone. To win the hearts and loyalties of mankind to freedom, we must develop ideas and faith—as a substitute for the sword.

Third, I believe in the economic system chosen by the American community, loosely (often too loosely) called the free enterprise system. This system, when it functions properly, permits the maximum freedom to the individual consistent with the common good. Free enterprise does not mean freedom to exploit, to monopolize or to waste. Essential to a system of free enterprise is a climate where new small and independent businesses can be conceived and born, can grow and prosper.

An economic system based on private enterprise can better serve the common good, not because it enables some men to enrich themselves, but because it develops a high and rapidly rising level of living. It can best insure the American prosperity so vital to world prosperity and to world peace.

Fourth, I believe that the common good must include the protection of those who suffer misfortune. The American people recognize that the adjustments which are inevitable in a changing and developing economy often work hardships on individuals. Through their Federal Government, they have wisely provided in the past, and should continue to provide in the future, a program of social security—for example, unemployment insurance and old-age pensions—for the benefit of those who are unable to work or, if able and willing to work, are for any reason whatever unable to find sufficiently remunerative employment to protect themselves against want. Such individual protection against hazards should be still further extended and as rapidly as practicable.

Fifth, I believe that the common enterprises in which we engage—and the greatest of our common enterprises is Government itself—need not be wasteful, inefficient or unimaginative. When Government suffers from these ailments, it is primarily because the citizens fail in vigilance. With the heavy responsibilities facing America abroad, we must clean up Government waste and inefficiency.

This five-point creed has guided my record in public service for the past 15 years—and the votes I cast in the Senate this past year. Thus I supported the Marshall plan, and added my own proposals for a great Marshall plan of ideas which I shall tell you more about in a later broadcast. Thus I have supported a strong defense establishment, but opposed the idea of a preventive war. Thus I have fought for a better break for small-business men, about which I shall tell you more next week. Thus I have supported the new Social Security Act and added my own plea for protection of mothers with dependent children—which was accepted by the Senate. Thus I led the fight with four speeches on the Senate floor for the Hoover Commission proposals—a largely successful fight to increase the efficiency and economy of our Federal Government.

As your Senator I believe I have been loyal to the creed I have set forth. Often, I'm sure, you won't agree with my individual votes. I'm sure the people of Connecticut will agree with the over-all pattern. Often the issue on a single vote is not clear, measured against my five principles, or in any other way. Often the vote is difficult because the principles are broad and the legislation must be specific.

I hope you will write me care of this station and let me send you material about my 15 years in public service, and notably about my record in the Senate, and contrast this with my opponent's record.

I like to think that my Senate record has been based not only on principle but on courage and independence in the application of principle. Next week I shall give you some examples which bear on this.

I began this talk tonight by stating that the people of Connecticut, in choosing two Senators and six Congressmen next month, may well decide the future course of America. The Congress is dominated by its committee chairmen, who are always members of the majority party. Under the seniority rule, we know right now who would wield the power if the Republicans win control. Do you want Senator MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, to be chairman of the important Committee on Expenditures? Do you want Senator CAIN, who fights the battles of the real-estate lobby, as chairman of the Committee on Public Works? Do you want to put into power a party powerfully influenced by Senator JENNER, who recently described the career of General Marshall as a "living lie"? One of the most powerful men in Congress is the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. That would be Representative TABER who called the Marshall plan "operation rathole." Do you want this country and its foreign policy turned over to Senator TAFT and Senator WHERRY? Senator TAFT you know voted against the Atlantic Pact, against military assistance, point 4, and Marshall plan appropriations.

These men sound like a roster of the Chicago Tribune's hall of fame. Are these the men who can lead us toward the peace of mind and quiet of soul we so fervently pray for?

I cannot promise you that we shall achieve peace of mind and quiet of soul in our time, in your generation or mine. Indeed I can promise you little except that I shall fight for your interests as I see them, even when sometimes I think the majority of you may not agree with me.

But even when our own progress is slow, we must continue to work for peace of mind and quiet of soul—in our children's time. That should be our common goal, our common good. Let us rededicate ourselves anew to this great effort.

Barring of Soviet Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD several news dispatches, which appeared recently relative to the barring of trade with the Soviet Union.

There being no objection, the article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of August 28, 1950]

WAR AID TO SOVIET DENIED BY BRITAIN—LABOR MINISTER CONTRADICTS CHURCHILL, BUT COMPANY HEAD SUPPORTS ALLEGATION

LONDON, August 27.—Arthur G. Bottomley, Secretary for Overseas Trade in the British Labor Government, said today that in trading with the Soviet Union, Britain had taken care not to send any commodities that might contribute to the Soviet Union's war potential.

At the same time, however, a British machine tool manufacturer said that his company was producing equipment ordered for the Soviet Union and Poland in 1948 that could easily be converted for making armaments.

Mr. Bottomley's statement was a comment on the allegation made by the Conservative Party leader, Winston Churchill, in a radio broadcast last night that machine tools, particularly of the class required for the manufacture and repair of tanks, were being produced in this country for the Soviet Union.

"In supplying goods to Russia, Britain has been careful to withhold any commodities which come into the category of strategic priority," Mr. Bottomley said.

Mr. Bottomley, who negotiated Britain's trade arrangements with the Soviet Union, both this year and last, added:

"What has happened is that we have had essential supplies from Russia in the shape of grain and timber and in return we have had to make payment."

GRAIN, TIMBER RECEIVED

Last year Britain received 1,000,000 tons of coarse grain from the Soviet Union and 100,000 standards of timber. This year arrangements have been made for the supply of 150,000 standards of timber."

"The goods supplied by Britain [to the Soviet Union], while covering a wide range, have been outside the category of those necessary for building up war potential," Mr. Bottomley said.

This statement seemed at variance with Mr. Churchill's remark last night that the head of Craven Bros'. machine-tool works had been asking the Government for 2 years whether he should fulfill contracts for making machine tools for the Soviet Union, particularly tools of the class required for tank manufacturing and repair.

The head of the company, Mr. Churchill stated, had said that his workmen were disturbed at doing work of that kind for the Soviet Union and Poland and did not like to have Soviet Government inspectors in their workshops.

J. R. Greenwood, chairman and managing director of Craven Bros., supported Mr. Churchill's statement today. Mr. Greenwood stated that his company was about to complete the first of the orders for the Soviet Union, placed from 2½ years to 18 months ago.

"We have been doing business with Russia for 20 years," Mr. Greenwood said. "I have built up that side of our output. I, and the company, want to go on doing the work, but under present conditions we have to ask ourselves, 'Are we doing the right thing?'"

Mr. Greenwood said he had been putting that question to the Government for 2 years, but could "get nowhere."

CAPABLE OF CONVERSION

Mr. Greenwood, who said that the £1,000,000 worth of tools being made in his plant for the Soviet Union and Poland could be converted to arms-manufacturing purposes, suggested that the orders be suspended, not canceled, and the tools retained in this country for Britain's own rearmament program.

Some of the items would be prohibited for export if ordered now, but since the orders were placed in 1948 the Government had ruled that deliveries should be made, he added.

Trade with the Soviet Union and its satellites is governed by "stop lists" of prohibited goods issued by the British Government. One list was issued in 1949 and another last month, but they do not apply to 1948 orders.

As to another part of Mr. Churchill's statement, J. Hulme, senior works convenor at Craven Bros. and a Labor Party member of the Stockport Town Council, said:

"I don't think the men were aware of the Russian orders, but, in any case, they are not likely to be concerned, as they are used to it. Between the two wars it was Russian orders that kept Cravens going."

Mr. Hulme said he understood that there was a Russian inspector at the works 6 weeks to 2 months ago.

Mr. Greenwood said that the Russians were inquiring about 10 days ago when their inspectors might come and see the work now scheduled for completion.

[From the Wall Street Journal of September 6, 1950]

ALLIES SHOULD BAR ALL MACHINE TOOLS FROM RUSSIA, SAYS BERNA—INDUSTRY SPOKESMAN ASSERTS ANY TYPE CAN BE USED FOR WAR WEAPONS PRODUCTION

CLEVELAND.—Any machine tool can be used in armament building and therefore all types, not merely a select list, should be barred from Soviet-dominated countries by England and west Germany, Tell Berna, general manager of the National Machine Tool Builders' Association, declared here.

The reply of Prime Minister Attlee to Winston Churchill that England is not shipping machines of strategic importance to Russian-dominated countries, he said, either reveals an "incredible ignorance" of machine tool users or is a "political cover-up."

"You cannot say that a certain machine is to be used for tractors and therefore will not be used for tanks. All machine tools, of whatever category, have their place in production for war. Recognition of this basic premise is the only sound foundation for the determination of policy regarding sales to Russia and her satellites," said Mr. Berna.

"According to Mr. Attlee," said Mr. Berna, "exports of machine tools 'regarded as of key importance for strategic purposes' were stopped 18 months ago, except in the case of contracts already concluded before that date.

"The fact is that any engineer, for that matter any workman in a metalworking plant, knows that all machine tools, of whatever nature, are used in war production. The withholding of a few types of machines merely gives lip service to the problem. In fact, the types withheld can be built on the machines received."

But aside from these facts, he asked, why are British "shipments of these very machines still continuing on contracts concluded prior to 18 months ago?"

"Two and a half years ago, the United States Government stopped shipments of all types of American machine tools to Russia and satellite nations, even though these machines had been built in fulfillment of contracts concluded before that time," he declared. "Meanwhile, England continues to ship not only quantities of machine tools which Attlee says will not 'damage essential defense needs,' but in addition keeps right on supplying the Russians with machines of the very types which he himself states are 'regarded as of key importance for strategic purposes.'"

This same contradictory policy is also being exhibited in allied-occupied west Germany, Mr. Berna said, where authorities have issued a list of types of machine tools, made in west German plants, which are not permitted to be exported to Soviet countries.

UNION GETS BEHIND BAN ON RED GOODS—INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S ASSOCIATION ATLANTIC COUNCIL REBUFFS TRUMAN AND ASKS ARMY, NAVY, AND TOBIN FOR ADVICE

The 3-week boycott of Russian cargoes by longshoremen here became official yesterday afternoon. The Atlantic District Council of the International Longshoremen's Association, A. F. of L., unanimously approved a resolution barring the handling of such goods, except for commodities "essential to the United States defense or civilian economy."

The action of the council, which convened yesterday morning at 164 Eleventh Avenue to discuss a wage review with employing stevedores, was a rebuff to President Truman, who had said last week that the Government and not the longshoremen would set the foreign policy of this country.

The group qualified its stand somewhat by saying in a telegram to Secretary of Labor Maurice J. Tobin that it would handle such goods as were deemed by the Government to be necessary for defense or civilian economy. It added that the longshoremen must have the assurance of some high Army or Navy officials as to just what the necessary cargoes are.

On Tuesday, Mr. Tobin wired Joseph P. Ryan, union president, expressing appreciation of the patriotic zeal of the union's membership, but pointing out that it was essential that necessary products continue to be landed.

UNION ASKS TOBIN'S ADVICE

The council deferred action on handling goods from Russian satellite countries and asked for further policy information from the Secretary of Labor. It is such cargoes that have caused most of the protests from American businessmen.

Mr. Ryan said he had asked Mr. Tobin for explicit information as to just what policy the United States has framed on exports and imports in full consideration of the problems of national security and national interest. He added the opinion that the council probably would make some decision today or tomorrow.

The council, while deferring its decision on goods from satellite nations, did issue a specific ban against goods aboard the Gdynia America liner Batory, due to dock at West Forty-eighth Street late this afternoon.

Mr. Ryan said the longshoremen would handle all passenger baggage and mail, but no more, and that the same practice would hold for the vessel's departure next week.

The Polish liner will again be the object of intensive search by customs agents. Forty men will board the vessel in the lower bay about noon and give her a thorough going-over in line with the Government's port security plan.

The vessel was subjected to a similar search the last time she arrived here.

MUCH CARGO STAYS PUT

Meanwhile, 2,000 cases of Polish hams and nearly 600 tons of miscellaneous cargo from Czechoslovakia remained in the holds of vessels moored at piers 60 and 61 in the North River as longshoremen refused to handle it. Members of Local 791, the same group that instituted the embargo on August 14, they have steadfastly maintained their determination to touch no cargoes from Russia or satellite nations.

James Sullivan, shop steward for the local, said that the hams arrived Friday on the freighter American Traveler and the Czechoslovakian goods, largely shoes and glassware, arrived yesterday aboard the American Judge. Both vessels are operated by the United States Lines.

Mr. Ryan said the union would prefer to have the Government furnish a list of necessary commodities but, recognizing the difficulty of preparing such a list, it wanted at least advice on the nature of the arriving Russian cargoes.

The ILA president once again defended the spontaneous patriotic action of the longshoremen in refusing to handle the Russian goods. He said the great majority of the men working the docks have seen service in either of the two World Wars and "they don't have to have lessons in patriotism taught to them."

DENIES VFW MERITS CREDIT

He took issue with the Port of New York Longshoremen, post 7095, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which, he said, is claiming credit for having instigated the ban on cargoes from the Soviet Union. Mr. Ryan said the union wanted it understood that the ILA's New York District Council, its Atlantic coast district, and its executive council had approved the action of the men, and he added that these groups, and not any outside organization, would dictate the policies of the union.

Prior to yesterday's 3-hour meeting of the Atlantic District Council, John F. Condon, 33-year-old commander of the VFW post, said that British stevedores would be asked to aid the embargo on Red goods.

Mr. Condon said local longshoremen would distribute mimeographed statements headed, "Don't work for Russia," in the holds of the Cunard liners Queen Elizabeth and Mauretania, both of which were in port yesterday, and attach them to packages in the vessels' holds.

Mr. Condon was not a delegate to the council and therefore could not attend the meeting.

IMPORTERS PROTEST

Representatives of two importers' groups sought unsuccessfully to attend the meeting to urge that they be permitted to bring in $625,000 worth of merchandise from Poland and Czechoslovakia.

Mitchell Bogaty, of 246 Fifth Avenue, said that eight American concerns for which he is the buyer already have paid down in irrevocable letters of credit approximately $125,000 for Polish-made willow laundry and shopping baskets.

Mr. Bogaty said that orders for $500,000 of such goods had been placed in January and that deliveries had been arriving with each docking of the Batory. He said baskets with a wholesale value of $35,000 were due today aboard the Polish ship.

Another protest was made by Max Grossberg, an importer, of 1214 Broadway, and a director of the United States Stone and Bead Importers Association. He said that the group's 60 members probably had $500,000 tied up in letters of credit for the purchase of Czechoslovak rhinestones.

Mr. Grossberg said "They've penalized the importer—the satellite countries have our money and we have no goods."

Informed of the complaints, Mr. Ryan commented that "this might teach them not to do business with Russia and her allies."

FEAR SOVIET STILL GETTING VITAL ITEMS

(By George Cheely)

WASHINGTON, September 12.—United States-produced strategic materials may still be falling into Russian hands, a Commerce Department export control director admitted today.

"We cannot get assurances that controlled goods are not being transshipped to Russia or Soviet-dominated countries," John F. Havener, Assistant Director of the Office of Industry and Commerce, told a House Interstate Commerce Subcommittee.

REPORTS SOME PRODUCTS

Greater cooperation from importing nations is required, he said, and the State Department is making substantial progress after 2 years of attempts to get Atlantic Pact nations to control exports to the Russian bloc.

In reply to questions by Representative CHARLES A. WOLVERTON (Republican, New Jersey), Havener said he does not believe it wise to block all shipments of strategic commodities pending better controls. Much of this trade is with Atlantic Pact and ECA countries, he said, and is actually a part of our defense program.

Representative CARL HINSHAW (Republican, California) said there is "no cooperation at all between the British and ourselves."

The British, he said, had allowed a firm to offer atomic energy materials to Holland after our Atomic Energy Commission had refused to grant export licenses to Holland for the very important gadgets.

REPETITIONS POSSIBLE

The inquiry was prompted in large part by the fact that at least one molybdenum shipment to Britain was resold to Russia. Havener said that repetitions of this transaction are possible, since we cannot check the end-use of every shipment.

The reputations of the exporter and the importer and the normal requirements of the importing country generally are used as the basis for determining whether transshipment is likely, Havener said.

Export licensing is done according to the comprehensive export schedule, program determinations of the Commerce Secretary's interagency advisory committee, and the strategic rating of the commodity, he added.

CALLED SECRET INFORMATION

Program determinations and strategic ratings are both secret information, he said, but would be shown the subcommittee in closed session.

Under questioning, Havener admitted that "we should have more end-use checks," but said the Department is too short of money and staff. WOLVERTON exploded at this "same old reply," and demanded some action.

WOLVERTON asked if former export contro' officials William Remington and Michael Lee, under fire for allegedly having concealed Communist affiliations, had a hand in shaping export controls. Havener admitted that both had served at one time in the Office of International Trade, but denied that either had helped set policy.

WOLVERTON also asked for a full report on the Flying Arrow, an Isbrandtsen Line vessel that tried unsuccessfully to run the Nationalist Chinese blockade of Red China earlier this year. He said he understood the cargo was petroleum, a controlled item. Havener said he would give the committee the details on Thursday.

HINSHAW called attention to news reports that Russia is stockpiling rubber and demanded to know why rubber V belts were recently taken off the control list. Havener said the advisory committee had decided they were not of sufficient strategic importance.

HINSHAW referred to a trade advertisement that the V belts are used in a new landing gear which enables the B-36 and other large planes to land on soft ground. "I suggest the committee take another look," he concluded.

GREEN WOULD BAR ALL SOVIET TRADE—TELLS A. F. OF L. CONVENTION THIS MIGHT AWAKEN RUSSIANS TO SERIOUSNESS OF SITUATION

(By Louis Stark)

HOUSTON, September 18.—William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, today advocated a complete American boycott of trade with the Soviet Union.

In his keynote speech opening the federation's sixty-ninth convention, Mr. Green blamed Russia for the failure of the world to establish international peace and security since the end of World War II.

Recalling the federation's action in asking the Government to stop sending scrap iron to Japan prior to Pearl Harbor, Mr. Green said that labor saw the danger of war at that time before any other group.

The present world situation parallels the events that led up to World War II, Mr. Green told the 700 delegates.

Then he added:

"I am of the opinion that this convention should call upon our Government now to stop buying anything from or selling anything to Russia.

"Stop shipping goods to Russia from America because it will use them for the purpose of preparing for war."

Prolonged applause by the delegates interrupted Mr. Green. When it subsided he said that a trade boycott against Russia would perhaps awaken them to the seriousness of the situation and make a genuine contribution toward the promotion of international peace and security.

PAYS TRIBUTE TO GOMPERS

In the presence of an unusually large delegation of fraternal delegates and visitors from foreign countries, Mr. Green summarized the federation's viewpoint on the outstanding questions of the day.

He opposed a wage freeze at this time, predicted the eventual repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, and pointed to the passage of a liberalized Social Security Act, which he said was drafted by the A. F. of L.

Standing in front of an enormous picture of Samuel Gompers, his predecessor, Mr. Green paid a tribute to the founder and first president of the federation. He referred to the celebration of the centennial of Mr. Gomper's birth, which is now under way, and pledged that the organization would carry out the philosophy espoused by Mr. Gompers.

This observation was a reiteration of his promise on opening the convention that the federation would not "follow byways of ideological experimentation" but would "fight against infiltration by any ideology."

In his summary of the international situation Mr. Green denounced the "lying misrepresentations that have been made by the Soviet Government in which they accuse America of being responsible for this terrible situation in Korea."

CITES RISE IN LIVING COST

Mr. Green dwelt at length on the rise in living costs since last March, and particularly since the Korean invasion on June 25.

"What we are determined to do," he said, "is to fight with all the power that we possess to lift the wage level up so that it is established on a parity with prices before there is any freezing of wages."

The speaker reviewed organized labor's fight against the Taft-Hartley Act, pointing out that its repeal was advocated in the Democratic platform in 1948, and yet some Democrats, particularly southerners, had joined Republicans in opposing repeal.

Mr. Green added that the Democrat who voted against his party platform sacrificed his honor.

Resolutions proposed today and referred to committees called for an increase in the Federal minimum wage from 75 cents to $1 an hour, creation of a foreign affairs training school for labor spokesmen, denunciation of the so-called Stockholm peace petition of a colossal hoax sponsored by Russia, and moderation of tariff policies when they meant unemployment in this country.

President Truman praised the work of the labor press in a message to the annual convention of the International Labor Press of America, now in session. He said that the labor press "can keep American workers aware of their responsibilities in producing the goods and materials needed in the present situation."

"This," he added, "calls for production at full speed and without interruption for the protection of our free institutions and those of liberty-loving peoples the world over."

Industry Opposes Tariff Cut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial by Daniel Small, textile editor of the Journal of Commerce, May 23, 1950; a column by George Rothwell Brown, New York Journal-American, June 27, 1950; and several news dispatches concerning industry and the proposed tariff cut.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

ENTIRE TEXTILE INDUSTRY MUST MAINTAIN FIGHT AGAINST FURTHER TARIFF CUTS

(By Daniel Small)

Representatives of most sections of the textile industry have already filed their briefs with the Committee for Reciprocity Information taking a stand on the Government proposal to negotiate further tariff cuts on many textile items.

These industry spokesmen are unanimous in opposing these further cuts and some have asked for a raise—rather than further reductions—in the textile tariff structure. Any other stand on the part of the textile industry would be extremely surprising. There is no single segment of the textile industry which does not face sharp and dangerous competition from low-wage producers throughout the world.

According to all reports, the textile industry has long been regarded by the State Department as one of the major expendable trades in this country. The fact that so many other countries make textiles and find it easy to expand this industry has always led Government officials to accept the fact that the path of their products into this country should be made easy. The fact that the textile industry is one of the largest employers has apparently meant little. It has been argued that if textile mills are displaced by foreign producers selling here this will mean that more dollars have become available to such producers to buy other United States products, thereby opening up new employment possibilities for unemployed textile workers.

There can be no minimizing the threat of foreign textile producers to the American industry. In a brief presented by the cotton-textile industry, it is pointed out that the export trade has already dropped more than $500,000,000 due to devaluation of foreign currencies and increased low-cost foreign competition. The export trade had become a vital section of the expanded and prosperous textile industry in the postwar period. It helped maintain peak employment. At present, due largely to foreign competition, United States exports of cotton cloth are running at less than a third of the peak period in 1947.

The loss of such export sales is as important as the loss of sales in the home market. Every yard of cloth not sold abroad because of cheap foreign competition comes home to roost in the home market or more likely is not produced at all, thereby reducing sales and employment.

Accompanying the loss of cotton-textile export markets (which will apply to rayon cloth as well) is an ever-growing volume of imports of textiles and textile items into this country. These have been rising steadily, and there is every reason to believe the rise will continue. Lowered tariffs would make such an increase even more certain.

In the wool-textile industry the import threat is always present—mostly from Great Britain. In previous years most imports seem to have been concentrated upon quality goods, but further reductions in tariff, combined with devaluation, will open the way for medium and lower end fabrics. In the next few years the substantial tariff reductions on these goods, which started in 1939, will receive their first full test.

In the cotton- and rayon-goods import picture the threat comes from Japan first, then from England, Germany, Italy, and other nations. These low-wage areas have not yet trained their export guns fully on this market, but may be expected to make ever greater efforts as they fill the needs of their other markets. A definite tendency in recent months has been for manufactured cotton and rayon goods to arrive here. Such items as handkerchiefs, tablecloths, napkins, etc., which require more labor than just the cloth, are more susceptible to arriving here below domestic prices because of the greater labor-cost content.

It is important that the entire textile industry keep up a strong fight against any further cuts in tariff until the present duties have had the full test of a world competitive market. American producers are already suffering from foreign competition—which is just beginning to assume a clear-cut postwar pattern. The welfare of every member of the textile industry is involved in this battle for protection against low-wage foreign competition.

THE POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. Va., June 27.—Although West Virginia will choose neither Governor nor United States Senator this year, it is one of the States well worth watching in the November elections, because of the tip-off that may be given here on the importance of the tariff issue in 1952.

In many of the industrial States, as disclosed by their Governors at the recent gathering of State executives at White Sulphur Springs, the impact on American business and American labor of increasing foreign import is reflected as yet only in scattered localities.

But in West Virginia three of the leading industries are in trouble because of the Roosevelt-Hull-Acheson low-tariff policy, which is slowly but surely imperiling the American high standard of living, as the result of an overdose of altruism for the dear foreigner.

These West Virginia victims of free trade are pottery, coal, and glass.

As a result, in all six of the congressional districts the Republican aspirants will line up against the reciprocal trade agreements law.

Thus there is likely to be a significant test in this State of the tariff as a major issue for the Republican Party in the forthcoming Presidential campaign.

West Virginia's important coal industry has been hardest hit perhaps of any basic industry in the country.

It is estimated that there is 15 percent of unemployment in the coal mines, and the State's sales tax has been cut by from 18 to 20 percent.

The competition of oil is really something for the people here to worry about.

An interesting outgrowth of this general situation is the probability that former Democratic Senator Rush D. Holt, now a member of the legislature, will formally change his registration and become the coalition candidate, as a Republican, for the seat in Congress in the Third Congressional District, now represented by CLEVELAND M. BAILEY, Democrat, of Clarksburg.

The district went Democratic in 1948 by nearly 17,000. But the Republicans carried it in 1946 by about 2,500, and Holt believes that conditions this year will duplicate those of 4 years ago, when the Republican Party carried the House of Representatives.

Coal and glass are the two industries in this district which are feeling the baleful effect of the Truman economic and foreign policies.

It will be recalled that young Rush Holt, elected to the Senate in the Roosevelt era at so young an age that he had to wait 6 months before he could qualify as a Senator under the Constitution, turned to be the bad boy of the early New Deal.

He broke with the Roosevelt Administration when he began showing up the waste, extravagance, and crooked politics in the various boondoggling projects initiated by F. D. R. It eventually cost him his seat in the Senate, from which he retired in 1941. Then he came back to West Virginia where, in 1942, he was elected to the legislature as a Republican. He has been there ever since.

What is especially valuable to him today as a prospective coalition candidate for Congress on the tariff issue, is the fact that while in the Senate he twice bucked Roosevelt by voting against the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

If Holt decides to run as a Republican he must act to change his registration by July 1.

Republican chances are also said to be looking up this year in the First Congressional District, generally strongly Democratic but which went Republican in 1946 by about 5,000, and in the fourth, another Democratic district which the Republicans also carried in 1946.

The tariff issue as it develops in West Virginia will be watched closely by politicians of both parties.

EIGHT-MONTH DELAY IN TARIFF INCREASE RULING QUESTIONED—DECISION ON COMPLAINT BY NUT GROWERS MADE AFTER ANNECY PACT

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The United States Tariff Commission denied at the end of the week an application for a tariff increase on the grounds that the item was included in a trade agreement, but it waited almost 8 months for the trade agreement to become effective before it issued its denial.

Four days after the trade agreement was ratified the Commission said it could not increase the tariff because the item was now in a trade agreement.

NUT GROWERS' COMPLAINT

On September 2, 1949, the Northwest Nut Growers, of Dundee, Oreg., filed application with the Commission for an increase in duty on unshelled filbert nuts, citing Section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930. When the application was filed the United States was negotiating a trade agreement with Italy on this product at Annecy.

Section 336 provides that the Commission may increase United States duties on the basis of a comparison between United States and foreign production costs.

But, on the other hand, section 2 (a) of the Trade Agreements Act says that section 336 may not be used when the product in question is already subject to a trade agreement.

On May 4, almost 8 months later and only 4 days after the agreement was signed, the Commission denied and dismissed the application of September 2, stating:

CITED ANNECY PACT

"The application was dismissed because filberts, not shelled, have been included in the Annecy agreement which was concluded under the Trade Agreements Act. Section 2 (a) of that act forbids the application of section 336 to such articles. The concession was negotiated with Italy."

Italy signed the Annecy agreement on April 30, and the President has not yet issued the proclamation without which the agreement cannot become effective.

A similar application from the Northwest Nut Growers, filed January 26, 1949, was dismissed April 8, 1949.

LEAD COMPANIES ASK HIGHER TARIFF—21 FIRMS CITE MINE SHUT-DOWN RESULTING FROM HIGHER IMPORTS

A group of 21 lead companies from Alaska and the United States yesterday asked the United States Tariff Commission to boost lead import duties to prevent further serious injury to domestic producers caused by an unprecedented volume of shipments from abroad.

Organized as the Emergency Lead Committee, the group includes several of the top companies in the industry, including St. Joseph Lead Co., New York; Eagle-Picher Mining & Smelting Co., Joplin, Mo.; United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co., Boston, Mass., and Bunker Hill & Sullivan Mining & Concentrating Co., Kellogg, Idaho.

REPORT MINE SHUT-DOWNS

The committee said in its petition to the Commission that the present emergency lead situation has forced the shut-down of some highly important lead mines in Utah, and is threatening a similar result elsewhere throughout the West and Middle West.

The group named as the principal source of these lead imports Mexico, Canada, Australia, Peru, Germany, and Yugoslavia. It attributed the rise in incoming shipments to reduced tariff levels established in the Mexican agreement of 1943, last year's series of currency devaluations, and the 1948 cut in the value of Mexico peso.

The petition asked, in effect, two increases in the duties on lead ores and metal. The committee urged that the Commission recommend to the President that he cancel the 50 percent reduction in the 1930 rates—1½ cents per pound on lead ores and 2⅛ cents per pound on lead metal—effected in the Mexican trade agreement and, and further increase duties 50 percent over the 1930 level to 2¼ cents on ores and concentrates and $3\frac{3}{16}$ cents for metal and bullion.

CITE INFLATION

The 50 percent advance over 1930 tariff levels, the committee indicated, is required to adjust duties to current, higher price levels, for lead tariffs are fixed on the basis of quantity rather than as a percentage of value.

Lead imports, the group said, reached a peacetime peak in 1949 when they were equivalent to 99 percent of domestic mine production compared with an 11.3 percent proportion in the period 1930-39. Imports in 1949 totaled 399,500 short tons compared with 86,800 in 1939, according to figures presented in the petition.

The companies charged that the record-breaking peacetime flood of lead imports and lower domestic consumption have precipitated a sharp price decline which is causing distress bordering on demoralization in the lead-mining industry.

NFT TO OPPOSE MORE TARIFF CUTS—TEXTILE INDUSTRY MADE EXPENDABLE TO FOREIGN TRADE, BLUNT DECLARES

The philosophy of the State Department that the United States textile industry is expendable in the cause of international trade will be vigorously opposed by the National Federation of Textiles, Inc., the group said in a brief filed with the Tariff Commission protesting further tariff cuts, expected to be negotiated at Torquay, England, this September.

The Federation's executive and tariff committees, through Miss Irene Blunt, secretary of the NFT, announced their disfavor with the inclusion of textile items in each negotiating session, as a bribe to the textile strong countries in building their exports.

"Particularly, the two principal beneficiaries, Japan and Germany, as far as rayon and silk are concerned, will not take part in the conference. The concessions are being made ostensibly for other countries," Miss Blunt said.

"This is what happened before. The concession made to France at Geneva in reducing the rate on finished silks valued at $5 or more a pound reacted almost entirely to Japan's benefit, not to France," Miss Blunt added.

SILK PEOPLE PROTEST

"The effect of that last reduction to 25 percent can be seen in the protests made by the silk-weaving firms of Paterson and eastern Pennsylvania to Government officials in the Army, State Department, the Tariff Commission, and now the Customs. Scarf makers in the United States are facing loss of employment, too, because silk scarfs already hemmed and ready for use are coming in at absurdly low prices, entirely beyond the reach of these employing American sewing workers," Miss Blunt stated.

The NFT is collating information on domestic operations and import values and quantities in readiness for meeting the fabric discussions.

TUNG-OIL GROUP ASKS TARIFF AID

WASHINGTON, June 1.—Tung-oil producers made a bid today for tariff protection for their industry in the interest of national defense when the Government reopens reciprocal trade talks next fall.

But they were told by George B. L. Arner, chairman of the agricultural panel of the committee for reciprocity information, that his group has no authority to recommend tariffs on a commodity that already is on the free list.

W. Wilson Kilby, representing the American Tung Oil Association, warned that if the United States gets into a shooting war, the entire import supply of this strategic material would be shut off overnight. He said tung oil's importance was recognized by Congress in providing a mandatory price-support program for it.

PROTESTS COMMUNIST AID

Thomas Crawford, secretary-treasurer of the Tung Growers Council of America, also asked the committee to see "if there is any way to take tung oil off the free list and give us some protection." He declared it the height of foolhardiness to allow Communist China to earn dollars through duty-free oil exports to this country.

He pointed out that all competitive drying oils are protected by tariffs and that paints and varnishes which use tung oil receive the same protection.

Ammon Dunton, counsel for the National Fisheries Institute, also pleaded against tariff reductions on fats and oils, pointing to the huge domestic production of 11,600,000,000 pounds in 1949 which forced prices for menhaden fish oils from a high of 22 cents to a low of 4.9 cents a pound in less than 2 years.

Instead, he said the Government should be considering an increase in tariffs to protect this blossoming United States industry. He said fish-oil producers are doomed if tariffs are reduced further.

WARNS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The State Department's proposal to negotiate tariff reductions this year on a large list of chemicals will endanger national defense and may cause serious losses and unemployment in America's domestic chemical industry, according to William P. Marsh, president of United States Industrial Chemicals, Inc. A brief explaining USI's position, Mr. Marsh said, already has been filed with the committee for reciprocity information.

The company's brief recommends that tariff duties on the following chemicals in particular should be maintained at existing levels: Synthetic resins, acetic acid, acetaldehyde, butyraldehyde, ethylene glycol, acetone, methyl ethyl ketone, amyl alcohol, fusel oil, butyl alcohol, propyl alcohol, ethyl ether, and collodion and other pyroxylin solutions.

CALIFORNIA WINE MEN CHARGE LOWERED TARIFF IS RUINOUS—URGE INDUSTRY MEMBERS TO WRITE CONGRESS, BATTLE AGAINST DECREASING TARIFF PROTECTION—CITE 15-YEAR RECORD TO SUPPORT CHARGES

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., June 1.—Calling upon all phases of the California and national domestic wine industry, the Wine Institute urged adoption of resolutions by associations; letters to Congressmen from individuals, and contacting candidates for political office as methods to battle against elimination of tariff protection for American wine, in the Wine Institute Bulletin to members.

The information contained in the bulletin is part of the campaign that group is waging against proposed tariff cuts on different types of wine.

In discussing previous tariff reductions, the bulletin stated:

TARIFF RECORD

"The tariff record since 1930 is one of repeated and drastic slashes in import duties on most classes of wines and grape products. In the last 15 years United States import duties have been trimmed as follows:

	Percent
Foreign table wines, bottled	68
Foreign table wines, in bulk	40
Foreign sparkling wines valued at not more than $6 per gallon	67
Foreign sparkling wines valued at more than $6 per gallon	75
Foreign Vermouth, bottled	75
Foreign Vermouth, in bulk	50
Foreign brandy	75
Foreign wine vinegar	50
Foreign cream of tartar	25
Foreign tartaric acid	25

"Additional tariff reductions are now officially proposed on most major items listed above, plus dessert wines. Specifically included among the subjects for negotiation in Torquay, England, beginning September 28, 1950, are table and dessert wines; sparkling wines valued at not more than $6 per gallon; argols, tartar and wine lees, containing 80 percent or more of potassium bitartrate; Rochelle salts or potassium-sodium tartrate. Hearings on the proposed reduction already have started in Washington, D. C., and will be continued at intervals until next September.

"The American vineyard industry has been singled out for tariff slashes because it is a specialized farm industry largely concentrated in a few States. Only a few Members of Congress represent grape-growing constituencies."

AMERICAN INDUSTRY HURT

"Approval of the proposed reductions in dessert wine duties, which have not been tampered with in the last 15 years, would turn over the United States dessert wine market to such countries as Spain, Portugal, Argentina, Algeria, and Italy. A few million extra gallons of cheap foreign dessert wine would be enough to break the American market, causing inventory losses of tens of millions of dollars, destroying markets for California and other United States grapes.

"These tariff cuts can be blocked, but only if all members of the grape and wine industry and all of their friends in other branches of agriculture and in allied industries join in fighting this attack on the vineyard industry."

FAVORED TARGETS

""The specialty crops of the United States have been for many years the favorite targets of the low-tariff proponents. For two decades these specialty crops have been sacrificed on the international bargaining table. Western agriculture has suffered the most heavily from tariff cuts, and western agriculture of necessity must take the lead in halting the systematic destruction of its specialized farm industries."

FATS, OILS GROUP FIGHTS TARIFF CUT

WASHINGTON, June 5.—Representatives of fats and oils concerns today branded present tariffs inadequate and protested any reductions that would affect the industry.

In the last normal year, 1938, imports amounted to 30 percent of the national stearic acid consumption, L. B. Platt told the committee for reciprocity information. His firm, Stevenson, Jordan & Harrison, Inc., New York City, represents 11 major fats and oils concerns.

The present tariff of 12½ percent will allow stearic acid imports to displace domestic supply, Platt said. This would be reflected in the tallow market with lower prices to the farmer for livestock and higher prices to the consumer for beef, he added. The lower requirements of soap manufacturers—now concentrating on detergents—will add to this situation, Platt said.

The diversified uses of fatty acids—in plastics, rubber, pharmaceuticals, and explosives—are vital to the national defense, he argued, and must not diminish because of cheap European imports. Lower wages are the chief reason for the lower selling price of imports, Platt said.

I. M. Colbeth, the Baker Castor Oil Co., New York, agreed that tariffs and fats and oils products should not be cut. He pointed out that castor oil is an important industry item, but one that can be easily threatened by cheap imports.

R. D. Parker, president of the Dry Color Manufacturers Association, New York, asked for retention of present duties on inorganic pigments such as sodium bichromate and zinc chromate. C. H. Love, C. K. Williams & Co., Easton, Pa., supported this view, saying that German manufacturers would soon challenge domestic firms for United States trade.

Donald Cole, H. J. Baker & Bros., New York, spoke for continuation of present tariff rates on precipitated chalk. William W. Walker, McAndrews & Forbes Co., New York, and R. T. Goodwin, the J. S. Young Co., Baltimore, urged that tariffs on licorice extracts remain at present levels.

NEW CHEMICALS TARIFF CUTS SEEN PERILING JOBS, RESEARCH

WASHINGTON, June 8.—American and British makers of organic chemicals locked horns today over proposed tariff reductions for imports of intermediates, dyestuffs, and other organic products.

Appearing before the committee for reciprocity information, officials of the Synthetic Organic Chemicals Manufacturing Association definitely opposed any reductions, while representatives of Imperial Chemical Industries, New York, maintained that low-cost imports would do no harm to American industry. The Plastics Materials Manufacturers Association took issue with similar claims the ICI had made earlier in regard to plastics raw materials.

Research and development staffs will be the first to be cut, if tariffs are reduced to allow substantial quantities of basic organic chemicals to be imported, Synthetic Organic Chemicals Association President Sidney Moody declared. Lower costs of imports generally being proportionately lower labor costs, Moody said.

Stewart Hotchkiss, consulting engineer for the association, declared that although supplies have not met demand in Europe, there they will by 1952 and that there will be a world surplus in intermediates in 1953.

QUESTIONS WAGE COMPARISONS

"There is little opportunity to employ labor-saving devices in organics manufacture because of the 'batch' nature of the industry," Moody said. "Labor costs in the United States are from four to six times those in Europe," Hotchkiss reported.

Percy A. Shay, representing ICI, called American tariffs on coal-tar intermediates "the highest anywhere in the world." "The 45 percent ad valorem plus 70 cents a pound duty is a barrier to domestic growth," he said. He attacked comparisons of labor costs, saying that national insurance and other employers' considerations must be added to get a true British labor cost.

Despite present prohibitive tariffs, the relative importance of intermediates and dyestuffs has declined since 1922, William De Gelsey of the ICI told the committee. "Intermediates accounted for only 30 percent of organic output in 1948 compared to 80 percent in 1922," he said.

PRICE DISPARITIES CITED

Association representatives expressed fears that partly finished goods would be imported by ICI and completed here, if import duties are lowered. ICI recently purchased a plant in Rhode Island which might be used for this purpose, but De Gelsey denied that this had prompted the request for a tariff reduction.

ICI's request was attacked by Frank H. Carman, general manager of the Plastics Association. "Acrylic sheets from Britain are selling in New York at 20 percent below American prices despite the present tariff," Carman said.

He backed the position of Rohn & Haas, Philadelphia, and B. F. Goodrich Chemical Co., Cleveland, in insisting that plastics, a strategic war material, should be maintained in full domestic production. "United States production is ample to meet present and potential needs," he added.

LOWER DUTIES ASKED

"Low-priced imports will affect the industry's price structure and employment and research programs," Carman said. A cut in import duties would be unwarranted in the present buyers' market, considering the "ruthlessness of foreign producer," he added.

Lowered duties of germanium oxide were urged by R. H. Lawrence, W. R. Brance & Co., New York, who pointed out that the decrease in domestic zinc production had hurt the output of germanium byproducts. He was the last witness to appear before the chemicals panel, which adjourned to review testimony presented since May 31. Several supplementary briefs are being filed.

WARN PROPOSED TARIFF CUTS WOULD HARM UNITED STATES DISTILLERS

WASHINGTON, June 20.—Proposed tariff reductions on Canadian and Scotch whisky would prove harmful to the domestic distilling industry and United States labor, Joseph F. Haskell, speaking for the United States Distillers Trade Agreements Committee, today told the Interdepartmental Committee for Reciprocity Information.

Speaking at a hearing in connection with the forthcoming trade agreements negotiations with 17 nations to be held at Torquay, England, in September, Mr. Haskell, an official of National Distillers Products Corp., said that current international trade and domestic tax policies post a threat of "breaking the back of a substantial United States industry and sabotaging the job opportunities now enjoyed by approximately 800,000 persons."

OPPOSE FURTHER CUTS

The 22 American distillers on the United States Distillers Trade Agreements Committee previously filed a brief urging there be no further reduction of the import duty on Scotch and Canadian whisky under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act; that a reduction granted at Geneva in 1947, lowering the tariff rate from $2.50 per proof gallon to $1.50 per proof gallon, be withdrawn and the former duty reinstated.

The brief also urged that trade barriers imposed against the importation of distilled spirits from the United States be wiped out in countries with which the United States will negotiate reciprocal trade agreements. A further reduction of United States distilled spirits import levies to $1.25 per proof gallon has been proposed as a feature of the Torquay negotiations.

"There is no such thing as trading of United States distilled spirits in Canada, where Government purchasers refuse to buy United States-made whiskies," he said. "In England we are stopped from selling United States distilled spirits. As far as our industry is concerned reciprocal trade is a one-way street."

Haskell declared that reduction of the tariff rate would mean "that for the third time in 11 years Canadian and British whiskies would be benefited." He pointed out that liquor import duties were reduced from $5 to $2.50 per proof gallon in 1939 and from $2.50 to $1.50 in 1948 while the excise rate on domestic distilled spirits was raised from $2 to $9 per proof gallon in the same period.

The tariff reduction proposal, combined with the now-pending Custom Simplification Act and continued wartime tax rate of $9 per proof gallon would "jeopardize the employment of hundreds of thousands of organized labor in the United States whose livelihood depends upon the legalized industry," Haskell said.

SIMPLIFICATION ACT ATTACKED

He also attacked H. R. 8304, the Customs Simplification Act, which, the committee was told, "would benefit the foreign producer to the extent of about $1.20 per gallon in imported whisky through changing the basis of the tax and import duty from the wine (physical) gallon to proof (100 proof) gallon." Haskell claimed this change would cost the United States Treasury $15,000,000 in revenue annually.

The United States Distillers Trade Agreements Committee is composed of the following: Anderson County Distilling Co., Associated Kentucky Distilleries Co., Bernheim Distilling Co., Brown-Forman Distillers Corp., Continental Distilling Co., General Distillers Corp. of Kentucky, Glenmore Distilleries Co., W. A. Haller Corp., Heaven Hill Distilleries, Inc., Hoffman Distilling, Inc., James Distillery, Inc., Kinsey Distilling Corp., Medley Distilling Co., Merchants Distilling Corp., National Distillers Products Corp., Old Charter Distillery Co., Old Joe Distillery Co., James E. Pepper & Co., Stitzel-Weller Distillery, the George T. Stagg Co., United Distillers of America, Waterfill & Frazier Distillery Co., and Willet Distillery Co.

MORE GROUPS HIT TARIFF REDUCTIONS—RAYON, SILK, VELVETEEN, JUTE YARN, ANGORA WOOL PRODUCERS ADD PROTESTS

WASHINGTON, June 20.—Producers of rayon and silk, velveteens, jute yarn, and Angora rabbit wool today added their protests to the textile-industry chorus against further tariff reductions.

Like other branches of the industry, they told the Committee for Reciprocity Information, that competition from cheap foreign labor is a primary reason for maintaining—or raising—present duties.

Today's session winds up textile-industry hearings prior to the international tariff negotiations at Torquay, England, next September.

Recommendations of the interagency CRI will largely determine the scope of the negotiations.

RAYON-SILK GROUP TESTIFIES

The National Federation of Textiles, Inc., representing 98 rayon and silk fabric weavers, accused foreign countries of "hamstring" reciprocal trade agreements by restrictive trade barriers that are more effectual • • • than relatively high duties.

Harvey Wilson, speaking for the federation, told the CRI that "the State Department must recognize sooner or later the fallacy of reciprocity when foreign governments offset lowered duties by manipulation of exchange controls, rigid quotas, barter deals, and the like.

"Rayon and silk fabric manufacturers depend on the domestic, not export, market and to expect them to accept lower United States duties in return for reduced foreign tariffs is like a 'heads I win, tails you lose' proposition," Wilson declared.

SMALL BUSINESS BOOST ASKED

"The executive also challenged the Government to prove its intent to aid small business by refusing to lower duties. The 1947 census of manufactures showed that 83 percent of rayon and related broadwoven fabric establishments employed less than 500 workers," he said.

"Although the present ratio of rayon imports to domestic production is very small, it isn't sensible to wait to be hurt before complaining," Wilson added.

The velveteen industry "cannot exist without tariff protection, and current rates should be raised the full permissible amount," Howard Richmond, of that industry's tariff committee, told the CRI.

VELVETEEN IMPORTS RISE

"Japan can flood the United States market with low-cost velveteens," Richmond declared. "In 1950, total imports—mostly from Italy—will approach 500,000 yards, compared to 110,000 last year," he predicted.

Arguing that current duty of 25 percent is too low, he told the committee that Japan swamped the United States market in the thirties when rates were 62.5 percent.

Joseph C. Mahoney of the Soft Fiber Manufacturers Institute declared that, if duties are reduced, the United States market for jute yarns will be lost to India, while our markets for flax and hemp yarns will be lost to the United Kingdom and the Continent.

Citing India's overwhelming labor-cost advantage, Mahoney told the CRI "that even with the slight protection of present rates, India can sell jute yarns here at a considerable price advantage."

"Any increase in imports of jute yarn and twine will mean a corresponding loss of needed dollar exchange to Pakistan through a decline in raw jute exports to the United States," he asserted.

SPINNERS PROTEST TARIFF-RATE CUT—PRODUCER OF SALE YARN TELLS OF DANGER TO UNITED STATES MILLS IN CRI BRIEF

CHARLOTTE, N. C., June 26.—Manufacturers of carded and combed cotton sales yarns say that a further reduction in tariff rates would encourage a heavy influx of yarns into the United States and would threaten thousands with a destruction of their means of livelihood.

As a device for closing the so-called dollar gap, the State Department will consider tariff negotiations and possible concessions with 23 or more countries in Torquay, England, in September.

The Southern Combed Yarn Spinners Association of Gastonia and the Carded Yarn Association of Charlotte have joined the American Cotton Manufacturers Institute and other trade groups in filing a general brief protesting proposed tariff cuts on textiles.

ADDITIONAL BRIEF FILED

However, a supplementary statement pertaining to cotton sales yarns, presented by E. N. Brower, president of the Rockfish Mebane Yarn Mills, Inc., of Hope Mills, N. C., and a manufacturer of both carded and combed cotton sales yarn, has been filed with the Committee for Reciprocity Information in Washington in behalf of the yarn associations.

The statement points out that many of the approximately 275 yarn plants, mostly small in size, and situated largely in the Southern and Eastern States, are in relatively small communities where the mill payroll is the chief source of income for workers and their families.

For instance, it is estimated that in Gaston County, N. C., the center of the combed sales yarn industry, at least 40,000 people, or two-thirds of the population, get their living directly or indirectly from the steady operation of the mills in that county.

EXCEEDS DOMESTIC NEEDS

The statement points out that the potential production of yarns in this country already exceeds the poundage required by domestic consumers, and that during the past 3 years foreign producers have captured most of the export markets for sales yarn.

This, the statement says, has been due to the fact that the manufacturing costs in other countries are so materially lower than those in the domestic sales yarn industry. It goes on to say:

"The average wages in the United Kingdom are approximately one-third of those of our industry; in France and Italy, one-fourth; and those of Japan and India are about one-tenth.

"As a result, the American exports of cotton yarn have declined from 92,112,000 pounds in 1947 to 26,122,000 pounds in 1949, with a current annual rate of approximately 21,000,000 pounds.

"On the other hand, the imports of cotton yarn, which reached a low during June 1949 of 4,000 pounds, have grown progressively until March 1950, during which 90,000 pounds were imported.

"While the impact of these imports has not as yet been sufficient to cause undue hardship, the rapidity with which they are increasing under existing tariff rates gives cause for great concern to the sales yarn producers.

"While a greater part of the imports has consisted of the finer counts of combed yarns, the displacement of production in the finer mills have caused these mills to shift their production to lower counts of yarn, thereby having the same effect as if the coarser counts had also been imported."

WOOL GROUP URGES CANCELLATION OF TORQUAY MEETING

Secretary of State Dean Acheson yesterday was urged to terminate plans for the tariff cut conference scheduled for Torquay, England, in September in a telegram dispatched from the New York office of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers. The wire requested termination of the plans to reduce further current tariffs at Torquay in September.

"Recent events have underscored the broad public desire for leadership to keep this country strong in face of the forces of aggression," the telegram said. "One source of strength is our industrial organization. It should not be jeopardized nor demoralized by further reductions in our tariffs, which are designed to protect it from foreign low-wage competition.

"The wool textile industry does not desire to be dependent on war orders for its existence," the wire continued. "It does seek, however, to preserve its defense potential by fulfilling the normal requirements of the American market unhampered by competition from low-wage areas, and for this reason we again record our opposition to the Torquay conference."

ACTION ON TARIFF TO AFFECT PRICES—EMBROIDERED HANDKERCHIEFS FROM CHINA SEEN ADVANCED 9 TO 11 CENTS AT RETAIL

Price advances on Chinese embroidered handkerchiefs retailing under $1 are due when the higher rates of duty go into effect in the near future as a result of the withdrawal of tariff concessions to China.

Importers said yesterday, however, that no increase is expected in prices of embroidered handkerchiefs already on their shelves or in bonded warehouses.

Handkerchiefs are one of the important items affected in the list of withdrawn tariff concessions issued by the State Department on Wednesday. The tariff rate on typical imports of embroidered handkerchiefs, covering both Chinese and Madeira types, will rise from 2 to 3 cents a unit and from 20 percent to 40 percent ad valorem.

One trade source estimated this will mean a rise in the lowest retail price range from 39 to 50 cents, of the 50-cent item to 59 cents and the 59-cent handkerchief to 65 to 75 cents. It is expected that handkerchiefs retailing at $1 each and more will not be affected in price, due to possible changes in design or construction, to absorb the higher duty.

Trade sources pointed out that the action by the State Department in announcing the withdrawal of tariff concessions represented no change in policy toward trading with Communist China. The point was made that the State Department took the action inasmuch as the Chinese Nationalist Government in Formosa had abrogated the trade agreement with this country on May 5.

It was pointed out that the State Department list does not include withdrawal of all the concessions granted to China. Several countries, which are contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, are interested in these items and consultations are being held with the State Department. If these consultations are completed successfully, the present Geneva rate will be continued on such items.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I herewith include in my extension of remarks a copy of a radio address I made last evening over Station WTIC, Hartford, Conn., on the issues of foreign policy.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Good evening, friends and neighbors. Last Wednesday, at a meeting in the great Consolidated High School in West Cornwall, I was asked a six-word question—the most important question facing the American people. The question was: What do we do about Russia?

I said I would answer it tonight. I suggest that all candidates discuss this question. It can't be brushed aside by arm waving or slurs or slogans. How do we stop Russia? This is the key question for all of us today. War or peace depends upon it.

The issues of foreign policy are now more important than all our domestic questions combined. They can mean life or death for millions of Americans—freedom or slavery for hundreds of millions of human beings throughout the world.

There has been a revolution in American foreign policy since 1945—a change more profound than has ever been experienced by any victorious great power in so short a time. We have completely reversed our historic policy of "no entangling alliances." We have now decided that, for our own protection, we must resist any aggression that threatens world peace, wherever it may occur. The question now before the voters of Connecticut, as I shall show, is whether to ratify that policy, or repudiate it. This is the question you must decide on November 7. The question for you is nothing less than that.

Symbolic of the great change that has taken place is the action in Korea—an action which would have been unthinkable 10 years ago. In the 3 months since the Korean war began, the United States has led the free world in what may perhaps prove to be the most decisive step in modern history. We have taken the lead in transforming the United Nations from a none-too-polite forum of debate into a mighty force to police the world. In three short months we have lifted the hearts of free peoples everywhere. We have given new hope to mankind for the achievement in our own time of a peaceful and secure world.

The action in Korea is one more step in a series of extraordinary accomplishments which stand out in all the uproar and confusion—yes, and the present deliberate distortion by my opponent—that has befogged the discussion of foreign policy in recent months. These accomplishments, which I shall list very briefly, have required decisions just as bold, and staff work just as brilliant, as that required of any victorious commander in the field. The common front that has now been built up against aggression didn't just happen. (Even in one's own family, where the blood runs thicker than water, a common front doesn't just happen.) No, it has been created step by step through a long, difficult process—often hazardous, and sometimes with set-backs.

In 1945, we began to see that there was to be no pause in the imperialistic drive of the Soviet Union. In 1946, the Soviet threat against Iran and the oil-rich Middle East was checked. In 1947, the Truman doctrine blunted the Russian drive against Turkey and Greece, and 3 years of assistance since then have not only hurled back the threat of military aggression in the eastern Mediterranean but have stimulated economic recovery and long-range democratic advances.

In 1947, also, we developed the Rio Pact, which set up the first machinery for collective action in case of an attack on any American nation. And in the same year, I was able to see the Voice of America programs, for which I had been fighting and for which I was responsible as Assistant Secretary of State, established on a long-term basis.

In 1948, we launched the Marshall plan, known as the European recovery program. Under the inspired leadership of my close friend, Paul G. Hoffman, the ECA has rescued the European Continent from economic chaos and prostration. The fruits of that program, in turning back the tide of communism, are particularly evident in Italy, where I inspected ECA projects last June.

When the Soviets retaliated after the Marshall plan, by trying to blockade Berlin, we instituted the airlift and forced them to back down.

In 1949 came the North Atlantic Treaty—binding us more closely together with the free nations of western Europe. This was followed by the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, which is now developing toward a continental military force in Europe, under unified control.

In this year, 1950, we have the beginnings of the crucial and vital point 4 program, which I shall come back to later.

Throughout this postwar period we have worked unceasingly to strengthen the United Nations and to help establish UN controls of atomic weapons—an area in which my colleague, Senator MCMAHON, has contributed so brilliantly. I was myself privileged to take the lead on behalf of the United States and to play a major part in the creation of one UN agency, the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization—UNESCO.

Now, what does this add up to? It is a record of rolling back communism wherever our capabilities permitted. We gave economic and military aid to Nationalist China, in its civil war with the Chinese Communists, but its armies and its popular support disintegrated on the Chinese mainland. We sought to give freedom to Poland and other lands of eastern Europe, but the Soviets tore up every wartime agreement they made. These were defeats, yes. Nothing short of full-scale military intervention by the United States—an effort at least 10 or 20 times the present effort in Korea—would have saved China. And nothing but a full-scale world war III could have driven the Red army out of Poland and off the soil it occupied in Europe at the end of World War II.

Now, how can this election, here in Connecticut, determine whether the United States is to move forward along the general lines of our present creative and dynamic foreign policy—or double back toward isolationism and head-in-the-sand irresponsibility?

There is today in the United States Senate a powerful group of Republicans who have opposed or sought to weaken nearly every great forward step we have taken. This group includes Senator TAFT, the chairman of the Republican policy committee, and Senator WHERRY, the Republican floor leader. It also includes Senator JENNER, who recently described the career of General Marshall as a living lie. It includes Senator KEM, Senator MALONE, and other bitter-end isolationists. If the Republican Party gains seven Senate seats in this election, these men would control and dominate the Senate. They would thus have the last word in foreign policy. They are watching Connecticut eagerly. They figure they have in the bag five or six of the seven they need—and the two key seats to give them control are here. They know they can control any Republican newcomers to the Senate, through the seniority system.

Therefore, when you vote on November 7, remember you are voting on whether you want to turn over America foreign policy to TAFT, to WHERRY, JENNER, MALONE, KEM, and CAPEHART. As you see, this is no mere State election. You are voting on policies which affect the entire world and which will affect it for decades to come.

Now let us glance at the record of this group on foreign policy. I speak from bitter personal experience; it was Congressman TABER—who would become chairman of the powerful House Appropriations Committee and who not long ago called the Marshall plan operation rat hole—it was Congressman TABER who tried to kill the Voice of America by calling it a racket, and it was Senator TAFT who held up its legal validation for almost 2 years.

In 1947, 16 Republicans, including the present floor leader, Mr. WHERRY, voted against the Greek-Turkish aid bill. The same year 20 Republicans, led by TAFT and WHERRY, voted to reduce foreign aid. Then came the Marshall plan. Senator TAFT mustered 23 Republicans in an effort to cut the authorization by one and three-tenths billions. Senator CAPEHART rounded up 19 to convert the bill into a relief measure and they cut it to $2,000,000,000. Next, the North Atlantic Treaty. Senators WHERRY, TAFT, and WATKINS marshaled 18 Republican votes for a reservation to withhold military assistance from our allies. Twenty-three Republicans voted to cut the appropriation 40 percent, from $500,000,000 to $300,000,000. On final passage of the act, Senators TAFT, WHERRY, and others who dominate the Republican Party, voted against any military assistance to our North Atlantic allies.

In January of this year, when the House defeated the Korean aid bill—the little ECA for Korea—192 to 191—130 Republicans were numbered among the 192.

I think it is now time for me to ask, "Just who has been giving the 'green light' to the Communist aggressors?" In truth and in fact, it is those who have tried to cut ECA, to undermine the Atlantic Pact, and to wipe out or cripple the point 4 program. Can the American people afford to give control of their Congress at this juncture of history to men with the international myopia of JENNER and WHERRY, TAFT and TABER?

Heaven help us if our foreign policy should ever be "Jennerized." Heaven help the defense of our country and the lives of our sons if our military and foreign-aid appropriations are again allowed to be "Taberized."

I shall now answer my questioner in West Cornwall about Russia. This answer is in five parts.

The first way to stop Russia is through the continuation, improvement, and development of the domestic policies initiated by and carried out under the leadership of President Truman over the last 5 years. The first requisite in stopping Russia is that we maintain and develop our economic strength at home. Our economy is now stronger than at any time in our history, with 62,000,000 Americans employed and national income at record levels. Next week I shall devote my broadcast to our domestic problems and opportunities, the broadcast I had originally planned for tonight.

The second way to stop Russia is military strength so overwhelming that even the men of the Kremlin will give heed. All such military forces should be organized and coordinated with a view to carrying out the rule of law in the world under the United Nations flag. The precedent of Korea is the key to the future security of mankind. It is a key that looms big on the pages of history. We must use it to unlock the door to freedom for the suffering peoples of the world.

The gravest danger in this respect lies in projecting the penny-wise pound-foolish attitude that has characterized so many of the Republican leaders in the past—an attitude which, if it prevailed, would ultimately, I believe, be paid for in the lives and blood of our sons.

The third way to stop Russia is through economic assistance to our friends and allies in the free world. Here again, along with the Marshall plan and following it—we must move forward to bring the benefits of our technological age to the world's underdeveloped areas, especially in Asia around the Soviet perimeter. We must help the famished peoples fight the poverty which breeds communism. I favor a greatly expanded point 4 program. The Republicans voted 25 to 8 against passage of the point 4 program. It should be increased at once to a minimum of $100,000,000.

The fourth way to stop Russia is in the extension of human rights. The UN Convention on Genocide must be ratified. The UN declaration on human rights should be implemented. The slave labor conditions in the Soviet Union should be fully exposed and documented by UN action.

However, these four programs, however comprehensive, will not clinch and solidify the world-wide struggle for the survival of free institutions unless we can win the minds and loyalties of mankind to the cause of freedom.

This is our fifth way to stop Russia, and it may become as important as any of the other four. It is in their appeal to men's minds and hearts that the Soviets have made most spectacular gains—with weapons of subversion and propaganda and lies—and with a minimum of cost and outright force. In the Senate I have fought for a great expansion of this phase of an all-embracing foreign policy. Such an expanded program in the war of ideas was vital before Korea. It is even more vital today. I shall tell you why 2 weeks from tonight. If you want my article on this subject in the current Coronet, write me and I'll send it to you.

In Korea, with victory now seemingly assured, a united and peaceful nation must result from the sacrifices of our youth. The authority of the United Nations must be double riveted. Justice must be meted out to the violators of elementary decencies. Aid must be given the Korean people. All this can and should be accomplished under United Nations auspices without any appeasement of or deals with Communist China, over Formosa or any other issue.

The five-point program I have outlined here is geared to the needs of the present world situation. It is consistent with the traditions of our country. It develops out of the spirit and the genius of our people. It partakes of their confidence in their own destiny and their hope for peace and security in a perilous world. And it presents the kind of challenge Connecticut never failed to meet.

State Department Injured 21 Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release for July 12, 1950, dealing with the 21 American industries listed in the Senate as having been seriously injured by the State Department's present foreign trade policy.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 12, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, today in the Senate listed 21 American industries which have been seriously injured by our State Department's present foreign-trade policy. The Nevada Senator offered the list as a sequel to a previously submitted list of victimized industries in 20 States. He emphasized that every State which has any of the 21 industries in the new list will be hit by unemployment.

Senator MALONE said: "The State Department's theory that the more foreign goods sold in this country, the more American dollars there will be in the hands of foreigners with which to buy American goods bypasses one basic question: Inasmuch as the free-trade importation of low-wage and slave-labor products in competition with those of high-living-standard American workers will force more and more American workers out of jobs, how can unemployed Americans buy the foreign products regardless of how cheap they are?"

The 21 American industries listed as the first sufferers are: (1) Crude petroleum and products; (2) aluminum in coils, plates, bars, and rods; (3) gloves and mittens, knitted or crocheted, wool and cotton; (4) fur felt hats and hat bodies; (5) silk piece goods; (6) stencil silk, dyed or colored; (7) knitted wool berets; (8) glassware, blown stemware and artware; (9) paper products; (10) spring clothespins; (11) reeds and cane, wrought and manufactured from rattan; (12) lead ores, lead bullion; (13) zinc; (14) copper; (15) seafood; (16) beef and veal, chilled and frozen; (17) corduroy and velveteen; (18) woolens and worsteds; (19) magnesite; (20) synthetic organic chemicals; (21) textile machinery.

Senator MALONE called on the Senators from the States having these 21 industries to join him "in an honest effort to put a stop to the State Department's foreign trade policy of encouraging importation on a basis which gives foreign industry an unfair advantage over American industry."

Continuing, Senator MALONE said: "There never was a consistent free-trader. He wants free trade on things he must buy and high import fees on things he must sell. A case in point is the position recently taken by certain brass fabricators, who wanted free trade on copper, which they had to buy, and a protective tariff on finished products similar to their finished products.

"We have the spectacle here in the Senate of one distinguished Senator after another going along with the State Department in its free-trade policy except where it concerns a product of his own State. A Senator wants free trade on everything except, say, oil—his State produces fuel; another seems to like free trade on most everything except clothespins—that Senator's home State produces clothespins. We must establish a general principle applicable to all American production and quit sharpshooting for the benefit of this group or that group and at the expense of the American workers and investors as a whole. If we are to have a fair import fee on one item, let us be fair about all items. Let us try a little basic honesty.

"In fairness to Americans let us fight against the present State Department policy which will remove the floor from under American wages and investments. Once that floor has disappeared, labor will be the first to feel the effects. The workingman, with his house half paid for and with his kids in school, will find himself destitute, forsaken by a Government that deliberately destroyed his opportunity to earn an American living."

State Department Dishonest Concerning Point 4 Expansion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio and press release for August 30, 1950, which charges the State Department with deception and dishonesty in its now revealed expansion plans for the point 4 program.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 30, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged the State Department with deception and dishonesty in its now revealed expansion plans for the point 4 program.

Senator MALONE said, "When administration spokesmen were confronted on the Senate floor with estimates that point 4 would cost the United States taxpayers thousands of millions of dollars, they blandly answered that the $45,000,000 request was not preliminary to request for larger sums and that money was to be used in this connection only to send American experts to advise the rulers of underdeveloped countries about projects. They settled for thirty-five million. Yet, word comes now that $85,000,000 of ECA funds are to be spent on the point 4 program.

Point 4 philosophy ignores the precept of common honesty in government. It was inaugurated in an atmosphere of dishonesty, the administration attempting to make it look like a small project which needed to study and but little money.

"The joker is that the measure provides that the private investments necessary for the development projects are to be guaranteed by the United States Government. In other words, losses due to socialization or confiscation of private property in foreign countries, or due to any other cause, are to be passed on to the United States taxpayer. Leading proponents of point 4 say that it is a 50-year program which will cost at least $7,000,000,000 dollars per year, or $350,000,000,000 over the 50-year period. Other estimates run higher.

"Point 4 was never a plan, but a loosely conceived form of global WPA, trotted out as a bold new program, hailed enthusiastically by the do-gooders who think that there is no limit to the taxes which can be taken from the American people and that we should share our taxpayers' money with foreign countries.

"To some of us, it was evident from the first that, despite claims to the contrary, the scheme contemplated the deep gouging of the United States taxpayer. If the foreign countries had national integrity and were to supply their own capital, then why wouldn't they hire their own American experts, as in the past.

"There is great merit in the idea of developing backward areas, and venture capital is abundantly available whenever foreign countries create a favorable investment climate through fair fiscal and monetary policies, demonstrate good will toward foreign enterprises, and establish a record which assures an investor a fair chance on his money.

"The point 4 plan would shift the risk from the willing investor, seeking a profit, to the American taxpayer. The American public should not be expected to make good losses brought about by the lack of integrity on the part of foreign countries.

"Point 4 cannot do the things that are promised in its name without a much deeper drain on the American taxpayers and much severer restrictions on American freedom than the Administration has spelled out. We cannot very well establish and set in motion a program affecting millions of people for 50 years and then suddenly draw back.

"The potential of point 4 should be reviewed carefully before the Government sends experts all over the world bearing promises on which our American workers will have to make good."

"Sold Out" by State Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my July 26, 1950, press release on our being "sold out" by the State Department.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 26, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged today that we have been "sold out" by our State Department. The Nevada Senator said that the foreign policy of our Government "which got us into this war was part of a deliberately designed plot to advance communism."

Continuing, Senator MALONE said: "The handing over of Asia to the Soviets, the arming of Russia through Marshall-plan countries, the encroachment of socialistic ideas in our legislation here, and the wrecking of American industry were some of the steps in the treacherous plot.

"Undoubtedly, Stalin thought he had the nod from Acheson to go ahead in Asia. Everything points to that. But Acheson's position on Korea was suddenly reversed, and it may be presumed that he is now apologizing to the Hisses and his other Communist friends. Our position in Asia and elsewhere is just what could be expected with the personnel of our State Department what it is.

"On the home front, the Red plot has been carried on within the administration by a constant attack on American industry. This attack has come through (a) Government regulations so designed as to eliminate venture capital, which made this country great; (b) taxes so designed as to eliminate initiative; (c) a foreign 'free trade' policy so designed as to curtail domestic production; and (d) reckless spending on the part of the Government so designed as to threaten our whole economic structure.

"Until this country squarely faces its errors in foreign and domestic policy, which is all one policy, until it abandons the 'spend and elect' theories of welfare-statism, and until its citizens are discouraged from running to Washington for handouts, we will continue to tremble before the threats of a people backward in production and culture. Until that time, the prestige of America will continue to sink as it sank in the face of the Korean affair.

"How far are we now from the mood for reclaiming our national self-respect? Unless there is a complete reversal in Washington's mood, this armed outbreak will be the occasion for more reckless spending, further demands for power, and more of all the same trappings that have accompanied this country to its present plight.

"There will, no doubt, be bigger requests for all sorts of things that can, in some way, be tied to the label 'national defense.' We will not question many of these expenditures. Peace that was so costly won has been thrown away by blunders and stupidities. And with it gone, we must, however sadly, prepare to defend ourselves against the possibility of new onslaughts.

"We do not anticipate that the present administration will curtail its spending on nondefense items. It has shown no love for a balanced budget or a strong currency. Now is the time Congress needs a little backbone to stand up against Government waste and against unlimited powers for the administration—all in the name of saving us.

"We need to remind ourselves that our first and foremost task is to keep ourselves strong. Only with a strong American industry can we win. The anti-Communist forces of the world that are able and willing to fight are outnumbered. The defense of the free world must be achieved by quality which is able to overcome quantity. We are not big enough to overwhelm our opponents by the massing of military power. Since we cannot hope to be bigger, our fate depends on whether we can be better.

"Where is the greatest danger—at home or abroad? We have been repeatedly warned that we are in danger from within. Since 1932 there has been a constant war against America, within our gates.

"The State Department's foreign free-trade policy, through the 1934 Trade Agreements Act, as extended, which has been erroneously called reciprocal, has removed the floor from under wages and investments and has stopped the flow of venture capital in a large section of the industrial field. American mines have been closed, and at a time when an adequate stockpile of strategic metals and a going concern mining industry is vitally needed. The so-called escape clause proved to be no escape; a deaf ear has been turned to the American industries which have appealed for relief from the State Department's actions. The so-called peril-point provision is just as much of a snare and delusion; in case of a test, it would mean nothing, because it provides only that, when the peril point is reached, the President write a letter to Congress. Nothing more.

"Let us clean up the home front, give assurance to American people that American industries and things American will be protected. Let us once and for all put a stop to the foreign policy which weakens our positions abroad and destroys our industries at home. Let's fight for ideals and for an administration that will uphold them when this war is at an end. The boys on the front have little to fight for unless they can know clearly that they are defending the American way of life."

Democratic Administration Foreign Policy Mistakes Led to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that this administration's mistakes in its foreign policy program has brought about the present conflict in Korea.

A splendid speech on the subject, which points up the mistakes of the administration, has been prepared for radio delivery by Mrs. Elizabeth Heffelfinger, Republican national committeewoman from Minnesota. This talk will be of interest to readers of the RECORD and Americans everywhere. I submit it for their reading. It follows:

Good afternoon, fellow Americans. The free world is rejoicing today because of the news of the growing success of the United Nations forces in Korea. In the flush of victory we must not let the mistakes of our foreign policy, which led to this war, become obscure. This is not the time for recriminations but along with our joy we must ascertain what went wrong with our thinking and how could we have so grossly misinterpreted the handwriting on the wall. Our past mistakes must make us realize today, more than ever, that we can still win the major battle of war and lose the peace.

In 1923, Lenin wrote: "The outcome of the world struggle will be determined by Russia, India, and China, inasmuch as they constitute the overwhelming majority of the population of the globe." Today Russia and her satellites have some 800,000,000 under her control. We, the free Western World, have the same number of people. The remaining 700,000,000 living between Korea and Iran will tip the balance of the scale.

Why have we lost the confidence of this group? We must understand a few historical episodes. The seizure of Manchuria from China by Japan in 1931 was the first act of aggression which finally culminated in the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941. In 1943, at Cairo, in December, we promised China to return Manchuria to her but in 1945 at Yalta, we betrayed that commitment and in secret agreement, invited Russia to take control of the railroads and seaports in Manchuria in return for Russian assistance in our war against Japan.

The sell-out to Russia at Yalta was to shorten the war and save American lives. However, Russia came into the war against Japan only 6 days before the end of the war. For every life saved at Yalta thousands of untrained and unequipped Americans, South Koreans, and United Nations troops have died in Korea today. We cannot sell out moral principles and escape the day of judgment. The Yalta agreement, famous for buying the good will of the strong by sacrificing the weak, will also be remembered for the prominence of those who signed it, including the name of one "red herring"—Alger Hiss.

The Korean war is a direct result of the failure at Yalta to think beyond the military objective. It is thought by many that secret commitments not yet brought to light were made at Yalta which permitted the Russians to take over North Korea, just as they did Berlin and Czechoslovakia. Korea was divided at the thirty-eighth parallel and Russia invited to take over North Korea from the Japanese, despite the declaration of the Cairo conference that one of our aims was the independence of Korea, a pledge renewed at Potsdam in 1945.

The thirty-eighth parallel threw out of line Korea's reasonably balanced economy making survival of either part impossible without outside assistance. Time-consuming negotiations between the Russians and the United States for full freedom of Korea brought no results. When negotiations finally broke down entirely, the Russians were in complete control of North Korea to such an extent that they refused to permit the United Nations commission to come in and conduct a free election. Instead Russia held its own election in 1948 and presented the North Koreans with the usual slate of unopposed Communist candidates. The Russians then announced the withdrawal of their troops, leaving behind, however, a highly trained and well-equipped Communist military force. At the same time the South Koreans, under a United Nations commission conducted elections and a Republic was formed headed by Syngman Rhee. In spite of the fact that the South Korean National Assembly on November 1948 passed a resolution urging United States troops to remain until the Republic was capable of maintaining national security, the United States started withdrawing troops and 6 months later, in June 1949, we had completely withdrawn from Korea, leaving only a small military mission of 300 men who were to train a constabulary of South Koreans for the sole purpose of internal security. This small police force was equipped only with light arms and ammunition received from our surplus supplies and all of it was over 4 years of age.

The North Koreans, during the past 5 years, had become skillful warriors because of the training they had received under the Communists, and because they were joined by Siberian Koreans—Koreans who had fled Japanese control and joined the Russian Army in Siberia. After our troops had been withdrawn from South Korea, President Truman recommended a program of economic aid. Leading Republicans in the House believed that under the present setup South Korea was untenable and that it was futile to pour American goods and machinery into a country which could not defend itself against Communist leaders, who even at that time were commanding North Korean forces in border fighting. The Republicans of the House attempted to amend this economic-aid program so the money could be used for military aid also. The State Department turned thumbs down on a Republican minority report which stated that Soviet troops are in positions of command as well as acting advisers in North Korea and that this development may well mean the launching of a full military drive and unless South Korea is prepared to meet force with comparable force economic assistance cannot of itself insure the safety and integrity of South Korea.

So Korean economic aid bill was finally passed in February 1950, calling for $110,000,000 to be spent during the first 6 months in 1950. However, less than half, or $45,000,000, was actually delivered during that specified important period. Military aid, which should have reached them at the same time to the amount of ten million three hundred thousand, 6 months later, only amounted to $200 worth of barbed wire. Other military material, which was marked rush for South Korea, still had not been sent at the time of the Communist attack this summer. The Communists knew all of this and realized we did not have a policy, or any real convictions about Korea, and that we did not carry through with our commitments. They further realized that we had no convictions about Formosa or Indochina, and they welcomed Secretary of State Acheson's answer to Senator VANDENBERG, when he asked what the administrative policy was. Secretary Acheson answered: "The administrative policy was to wait until the dust settled." The dust has settled on our American youth in Korea. On January 12, President Truman asserted he was against military aid for Formosa. The next day Secretary Acheson announced that the American line of defense was drawn through Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines. That statement openly told the Communists that we would not defend Korea or Formosa. Even as late as last June President Truman on his western nonpolitical trip asserted: "The Nation is closer to peace now than at any time during the last 5 years" and Senator CONNALLY, Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, felt that the private military and State Department reports indicate an easing off in the international situation. June 23, Secretary Acheson announced that our policy not to defend Formosa had not been changed. The next day, June 24, the Communists invaded South Korea and on June 27 President Truman did an abrupt about-face and announced that air and sea forces would be sent to the aid of the Republic of Korea and the Seventh Fleet of the United States Navy was proceeding to Formosa to defeat any attempt to storm that last bastion of Nationalist China. The rest of the tragic picture of unpreparedness is known to us.

The late James Forrestal lost his job as Secretary of Defense and later took his life because he knew our military budget was not equal to the commitments our administration had made all over the world. His recommendations and those of Gen. Omar Bradley in 1948 called for eighteen billion as a minimum cost of adequate defense. This was cut to fourteen billion by order of the President, a policy which was popular with the people who had not been told the tragic facts now so apparent to us in the light of present events. Our military weakness and the shortcomings in our preparedness cannot entirely be attributed to the lack of funds. It is the way the funds were administered. Atomic war was placed first to the neglect of ground forces and fighter planes and tanks to protect those ground forces. We did not have enough air transport planes to insure the number of men required for our worldwide commitments. The week the North Koreans struck, the last of our 14 large carrier air groups was being decommissioned. The week we embarked on police action we had only 7 large carriers out of a group of 20 we had had at the end of the war. Half of our 10 divisions were doing occupation duty. Before Pearl Harbor we were making annually 8,500 tanks. These tanks are now obsolete and we were making none in June. By the same token, in 1941 we were making annually 25,000 military aircraft compared to none as of June 1950. We had 2,025,000 men in the armed service in 1941, compared to half that number in June 1950. Our national debt in 1941 was fifty-five billion compared to two hundred and fifty-seven billion now. Our dollar then was worth 90.5, compared to 53.7 in June, and it is even less today.

On June 9, 13, and 20 the Senate Appropriations Committee, in supersecret hearings, heard reports on the Central Intelligence Agency telling of massing of Red troops and the moving of heavy artillery at the thirty-eighth parallel. The question is now, in view of these intelligence reports, Why was the United States, 4 days later, caught in another Pearl Harbor? The Korean campaign caught the United States in a tight, propaganda trap. It came at the time of a Russian peace crusade—the fallacies of which are apparent to the educated world but not so to the hundreds of millions of uninformed. It was a psychological defeat for us which resounded all over the world and was particularly depressing to those people of western Europe who were depending upon us for leadership.

Have these policies of the present Democratic-controlled administration brought us peace, stability, international security, or rather have they brought us war, inflation, and international chaos? If unity means a continuation of these policies, if disagreement with the administration is tantamount to conspiring with the enemy then we had better reexamine the word unity. The time does not call for politics as usual. If we continue to dissipate our strength in contests with Soviet satellites, we will soon become exhausted economically and militarily and at the same time we will be permitting Russia to build her reserve of economic and military strength to such a degree that in the end she will have the strength.

One-third of the people of the world today are slaves of a Communist dictatorship which recognizes no God. A dictatorship ruthless in its destruction of human liberties and the rights of the individual. A dictatorship dedicated to global war in which Korea is only the first incident. If we, who believe in God, and the dignity of man, are going to rally the free forces of the world to our side, we must persuade them of our sincerity and the integrity of our purpose so that we may form a united bulwark to protect those things which we hold sacred.

These people must in the future have confidence in the forthrightness of America. What can you and I do about it? The freedom of criticism can be reflected in our vote November 7. We can use our voice, our vote, for a change of administration in Washington, for wiser leadership to insure lasting peace—for preparedness against future Communist aggression. We can demand that the United States regain the initiative—establish a program of international inspection and control of atomic activity. We can fight for the amendment to the United Nations' Charter proposed by Senator VANDENBERG in 1948. In place of ineptness we can have power, strength, and integrity.

Hoarding Charge Byproduct of Socialistic Thinking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my press release for September 6, 1950, on the subject of hoarding, which is a byproduct of the socialistic thinking in high places in Washington.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 6, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican of Nevada, charged today that the administration's tirade against American families on the subject of hoarding was a byproduct of the socialistic thinking in high places in Washington.

The Nevada Senator said, "When the President attacks the honest American trait of providing for a rainy day, laying in supplies against a possible emergency, making provision for the future, he is echoing the thoughts of the Communists and left-wingers in our midst who want to set up a welfare state where diligent work, extra effort, individual enterprise, and striving to get ahead will mean nothing, where the shiftless, the improvident, the inconsiderate and the wastrels will be taken care of from the cradle to the grave."

Continuing, Senator MALONE said:

"In the first place, the tirade against provident American housewives for hoarding a few extra pounds of sugar, or something else which is not scarce, comes with ill grace from an administration which is the prize hoarder of all time—192,000,000 pounds of butter, and buying up more at the rate of 9,000,000 pounds a week; 170,000,000 pounds of dried eggs, and buying up more at the rate of 15,000,000 pounds a month; 104,000,000 pounds of cheese, and buying up more at the rate of 15,000,000 pounds a month. The Government has hoarded $50,000,000 worth of dried milk, is buying up potatoes at a rate that will cost the American taxpayers $87,000,000 this year alone—and that is only the beginning of the list. The Government is hoarding all kinds of foodstuff in caves and bulging warehouses and old airplane hangars from Maine to California. And why? To raise the prices of this foodstuff.

"And why does the administration say the housewives should not lay in supplies of food? Because it might raise the prices.

"Unlike the individuals whom it criticizes, the Government hasn't any use for all this food. It is wasting millions of dollars of the people's money, and creating inflation.

In conclusion, Senator MALONE said:

"This is but another illustration of the inconsistency in all economic matters—domestic and foreign—which marks the left-wingers of this administration."

Truman Succumbed to Acheson Influence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD my press release for September 13, 1950, concerning the succumbing of President Truman to the Lattimore-Acheson influence.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 13, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged today that President Truman had succumbed to the Lattimore-Acheson pink influence and that his recent failure to back up General MacArthur was one of several indications of a complete about-face.

In a statement issued from his Washington office, Senator MALONE said: "In the address, which the President asked General MacArthur to withdraw, the General had simply agreed with the President's previously stated position regarding the defense of Formosa against the Reds, but the Communist sympathizers in the State Department sold the President on the idea of crossing up MacArthur. It is another about-face in the President's pitiful attempt to follow conflicting ideas of his advisers, only some of whom are in the Hiss-Service-Acheson clique of Communist associates and sympathizers.

"Of all the President's conglomeration of advisers, the only ones who know what they want and follow an unwavering course are these Communist associates and sympathizers. The ideas of the Hisses, the Wadleighs, the Services, and the Lattimores, activated by Acheson, follow a definite pattern. This clique favored giving Manchuria to the Reds at Yalta; they favored the partition of Berlin without any provision for ingress or egress of non-Soviet personnel; they favored communism for China, as was disclosed by John Foster Dulles; they favored recognition of the Chinese Reds; they favored our sending financial and industrial aid to those European countries which would arm Russia and her satellites for world war III.

"Evidence of traitorous intent and purpose may be observed in the fact that when it was exposed that Britain and other Marshall plan countries were sending Russia war-making materials, not one of this influential clique lifted a finger to stop our money and materials flowing to those countries; in fact, they actually opposed the measure—S. J. Res. 151, the Malone resolution—which would have stopped our indirect arming of Russia. War-making materials are still being sent to Russia, thanks to the Red lovers in our administration.

"Only the most naive or blind could now doubt that Communists have been in policy-making position in the United States Government. Lee Pressman, the fair-haired New Deal official, recently confessed that he and others were Communists while holding Government office and that Communists moved into Washington and took over key positions in the Government in the early days of the New Deal. It has been exposed that Communists have held key positions in the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Labor, State, and Justice, in the Treasury, the OSS, Board of Economic Warfare, Air Corps Material and Service Division, War Production Board, OPA, WPA, and many other Government offices.

"In their attempts to discredit American free enterprise and American industry, the New Deal Reds were serving their Moscow masters well. It is interesting to observe that we have been led step by step into socialism. But the plot appears much more serious. There is considerable evidence that the American people are victims of a gigantic conspiracy conceived by traitors, or ignorant fools, in Government offices in Washington.

"The amazing thing about all this is that Communist associates and sympathizers are permitted to continue in high office and influence the President. Apparently this deplorable situation will not be corrected until the American people themselves correct it."

My Report to the Flood Sufferers of Crookston, Minn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, my home city of Crookston, Minn., this year, was visited by its worst flood in history. I was born in Crookston in 1901 and have lived in this city all my life. I was seriously disturbed by the floods that visited our city on two different occasions late this spring.

I made two trips by plane out to Crookston and the general flood area in the Red River Valley, to determine firsthand the extent of damage done, and to find out the causes of the flood, and to gain knowledge which would assist me in advancing projects and proposals to prevent these floods in the future. This problem is close to my heart, because many of my own friends and neighbors suffered great losses in the floods. I am determined to do everything I possibly can to assist them, and to work out a program which will prevent these floods again in the future.

It is well known now that I have introduced several measures in Congress, and have secured approval of these by the House Committee on Public Works, and the Congress as a whole, which would, if carried out, prevent these floods or make them less damaging in the future.

My efforts have resulted in a complete resurvey of the whole Red River Valley drainage system, including the Red Lake River, of course, to determine ways and means of preventing serious floods at Crookston.

I have suggested and have asked that particular attention be paid to the following proposals:

First. Construction of reservoir dams at one or more places on the Red Lake River and other rivers to hold back the floodwaters.

Second. The deepening, straightening, and widening of the channel of the Red River of the North between East Grand Forks and Grand Forks and the Canadian boundary in order that the floodwaters be speeded up to their destination to the northward.

Third. The deepening of the channel of the Red Lake River through Crookston and nearby areas.

Fourth. Federal assistance in the planning and construction of dikes at Crookston.

Federal action on this latter provision would take several years, and therefore the people of Crookston are going ahead on their own. It is quite certain now that the public-spirited and civic-minded citizens of Crookston will go ahead without Federal aid and build their own dikes. With this spirit of cooperation shown, we have still further reasons why the Federal Government should give particular attention to the flood problem in this area. The fact that the people of Crookston are not willing to wait for Federal action shows that the problem is a very serious one.

I regret that the administration has decided to withhold funds for some of the projects in the Red River Valley this year. These projects previously authorized by Congress had been given funds for their construction by Congress. These projects will now have to wait until the administration sees fit to advance the money which has been appropriated by the Congress. Otherwise it will be necessary for Congress to act again next year.

It has been a satisfaction to me to have sought and immediately secured the assistance of the United States Army engineers to study possible future flood-control projects for this area. Their services also have been offered to the city of Crookston, as far as technical assistance and advice is concerned.

I would like to insert here a letter I have just received from Col. Leverett G. Yoder, district engineer, Army Corps of Engineers, St. Paul, Minn., on the subject of possible future floods in the Crookston area. The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, CORPS OF ENGINEERS,
OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ENGINEER
ST. PAUL DISTRICT,
St. Paul, Minn., October 13, 1950.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
Crookston, Minn.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: This is in reply to your letter of October 9, 1950, in which you request to be advised regarding a statement attributed to one of the engineers of this office to the effect that a flood several feet higher than the recent flood could be or might be expected next year.

Although there is no record or knowledge of such a statement having been made by a representative of this office, it is possible that such a conclusion might have been drawn from a misinterpretation of a discussion pertaining to the maximum probable flood. Theoretically, it is possible for a flood of greater magnitude than the 1950 flood to occur at Crookston under more critical conditions of infiltration losses, heavier snow cover, more rapid rate of snow melt, and greater accompanying rainfall. This office has not attempted to determine the maximum probable flood for the Red Lake River at Crookston so that it is not possible to state whether its occurrence would result in a maximum stage only 1 foot or several feet higher than the maximum stage reached this spring.

A knowledge of the maximum probable flood is desirable as a basis for determining the degree of protection which can be economically provided by levees or other protective measures or as a basis for spillway design in connection with storage reservoirs. Rarely, if ever, is it economically possible to construct levees to such a height that the theoretical maximum flood could be contained.

Preliminary calculations indicate that the 1950 flood at Crookston would have an average frequency of occurrence of about once in 100 years. Stream-flow records at Crookston cover a period of about 50 years so that the conclusions relating to flood frequency are fairly reliable. At the present time this office has no information which would lead to the conclusion that another major flood might be expected next year, nor has it any indication that a greater flood might be expected next year.

Sincerely yours,
LEVERETT G. YODER,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers, District Engineer.

In conclusion, I want to assure my neighbors and friends of Crookston, that they can be sure that their home-town boy, HAROLD C. HAGEN, will always look after their interests and their problems, and that I will do everything within my power to work out a solution to this flood menace which threatens Crookston periodically. My help is pledged to them all in every way possible.

Administration Using War To Cover Socialistic Aims Advance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a September 19, 1950, release charging the Truman administration of trying to advance socialistic aims under cover of the war emergency.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 19, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, today accused the Truman administration of trying to advance socialistic aims under cover of the war emergency, "at the risk of prolonging the war and taking the lives of more American boys." Senator MALONE made this serious accusation in a statement issued by his Washington office.

The Nevada Senator said: "Every economic step taken by the Truman administration has been in the direction of socialism, and now, with the war emergency as an excuse, it takes us the final step. The only kind of controls the administration has ever wanted are those which mean the final and fatal step into the abysmal pit of socialism, from which there seems no turning back. The State Department insists in completing its one economic world program at the Torquay, England, conference, under cover of war, starting on September 28.

"The great strength of our country lies in its productivity. American industrial management has demonstrated its understanding of national problems as well as its ability to outperform the world. Our industrial capacities have been indispensable to victory. We have won two World Wars, not because one Yank can lick six other guys, not because our generals were superior in wit and strategy, not because our arms were more ingenious; we won because the hoarded reserve strength of the American industrial economy provided the weapon that could not be matched. We had an untrammeled production machine that, being free to grow, had grown rich in untapped resources.

"This we would not have had if we had been hamstringing ourselves with Government controls. American productive might has well been termed the arsenal of democracy, and it can best be maintained as such by a minimum of economic controls and Government interference. The United States will not remain the most productive nation on earth if the Government tries to run the mines, the factories, the farms, the stores, and the railroads.

"War requires initiative and imagination. Management for war production has to be flexible and sharp. With the controls which the administration wanted, these things will be lacking and our chances of winning the war speedily will be greatly lessened. With such controls our strength will be dissipated.

"Despite this the administration wanted these controls. There is only one explanation: the left-wingers in the administration to whom the President most often listens are willing to pay this high price in American blood shed to bring on socialism.

"Once the New Dealers get their hands on the economy, which has been their ambition for a generation, they will fight to keep it. Any power given Government administrators is not freely relinquished.

"The clamor for Federal controls over industry did not arise out of fear that industrial production is inadequate, but actually reflected the ambition of certain elements to seize control of the economic life of the Nation at whatever the cost."

Totalitarian, Anti-Semitic Propaganda Spread by Agitators Operating Under Cover of War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, in contemptible contrast to the brave spirit of our soldiers fighting in Korea stands the evil of propaganda being systematically spread about the country by a group of agitators, trouble-makers and hatemongers.

These propagandists include many of the very same men who tried to undermine our democracy in its life-and-death struggle with Hitler and the Axis Powers. Their strategy is to set race against race, and religion against religion. They are heavily financed and dangerous.

The details of this un-American propaganda plot have been well set forth in a release issued by the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League, 165 West Forty-sixth Street, New York; an organization which has for the past 17 years specialized in investigating and exposing these enemies of our American institutions.

Under general leave to extend my remarks, I include the release of the Anti-Nazi League:

MOST DANGEROUS WAVE OF ANTI-SEMITISM THREATENED BY PROPAGANDISTS OPERATING UNDER COVER OF KOREAN WAR—LEAGUE ASKS FEDERAL INQUIRY UNDER SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

Charging existence of a dangerous conspiracy to undermine morale and discourage enlistments in connection with the Korean war, the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League today sought a two-pronged Federal investigation into activities of a number of isolationist, anti-Semitic and formerly pro-Nazi publications and propagandists.

In a complaint to Attorney General J. Howard McGrath, the league requested investigation, under Selective Service Act provisions penalizing conspiracy to discourage enlistments, of the Broom (west coast weekly), Common Sense (New Jersey biweekly), Women's Voice (Chicago biweekly), and a number of other publications and individuals, including the Communist Daily Worker and a German-language newspaper in Chicago.

In a second complaint to Congressman FRANK BUCHANAN, Democrat, Pennsylvania, chairman of the House Committee on Lobbying Activities, the league urged congressional investigation of the same publications, and also of the Washington lobbying activities of Gerald L. K. Smith, Agnes Waters, George W. Armstrong, and others.

Both complaints were signed by Prof. James H. Sheldon, administrative chairman, and Herman Hoffman, chairman of the league's board of directors.

As examples of the kind of agitation complained of, the league cited the following:

"Prospective draftee confused on Jew problem, asks for advice"—full-page headline in the Broom, July 24, 1950. The ensuing article, purporting to answer an inquiry from a prospective draftee identified only as "Frank," puts the entire blame for the Korean war upon the Jews, quoting at length from the notorious Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a propaganda forgery popularized by the Nazis about 15 years ago.

"The Zionists * * * have given word for the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. * * * They are working with the enemy and will retard shipment of supplies and help the Communist forces in any way possible." (Excerpts from article in Common Sense, issue 118 (distributed July 20).) The same issue contains a long article by the Texas multimillionaire propagandist, George W. Armstrong (who admits paying for a considerable part of this propaganda), saying: "Our weakness is that New York Communist Jews control both our industries and labor organizations. * * * We have hybrid Jew Mark Clark as commander in chief of our Army and our Atomic Commission is pro-Jewish."

"Bring home our boys. * * * It is nothing but a mass slaughter and a put-up job. * * * This war is a Jewish conspiracy." (Women's Voice, July 27, 1950.) The same publication (one of the most notorious anti-Semitic publications in the country) also started a "bring home our boys" campaign during World War II, when Hitler's armies were pushing back our first troops landed in Europe.

Gerald L. K. Smith, a ringleader amongst all these agitators, has already held large meetings on the west coast, in an attempt to blame the Korean war on "Jewish influences." Taking obvious advantage of the press hysteria engendered by the atom spy exposures, Smith is again pushing a particularly scurrilous pamphlet called The Jews Have Got the Atom Bomb, plus an accompanying tract, Is Communism Jewish?

Meanwhile, an important part of the German-language press has adopted a similarly bad position. For example, the Chicago Burgerzeitung actually devoted half of its front page to reprinting the notorious letter that Hermann Goering sent to Winston Churchill just before Goering committed suicide, in which Goering insolently declares that future history will show that England and America were wrongly influenced in not having supported the Nazi regime of Adolf Hitler instead of fighting against it.

Without an immediate Federal investigation, the Anti-Nazi League warned, "The country faces the gravest danger today from a Nation-wide conspiracy of nationalists, isolationists, and anti-Semitic agitators, who have combined a new propaganda line, blaming a specific religious minority, the Jews, for (a) getting us involved in Korea through the United Nations, (b) strengthening communism so as to do business with both sides, and (c) stealing atom secrets for the benefit of the enemy—all of which is combined with a general attack along conventional partisan and lobbying lines, upon the entire foreign policy of the present administration."

"The sudden and heavily financed increase in this type of propaganda, reflected by anti-Semitic and former Bundist agitators all over the country indicates the beginning of one of the most dangerous waves of anti-Semitism and other un-American propaganda which has ever swept this continent," the league's complaint concluded.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—For further identification of the publications mentioned above, the Broom, was named in the first wartime sedition conspiracy indictment, and has lately been conducting a campaign to halt the dismantlement of German war industries. Common Sense recently urged appointment of Merwin K. Hart as Attorney General, and has printed a number of articles written by Robert Best, the American who broadcast for Goebbels on Radio Berlin during the war and is now serving a sentence for treason. Women's Voice is one of the most prolific distributing agencies for anti-Semitic literature amongst women's groups, and its office accounts for a large percentage of the distribution of such items as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, in this country.

State Department Cowardly Blaming MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release of September 26, 1950, stating that the very same State Department officials who made the stupid blunders that invited the Korean war are cowardly attempting to smear General MacArthur by placing the blame on him.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 26, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged today that "the very same State Department officials who made the stupid blunders that invited the Korean war are cowardly attempting to smear General MacArthur by placing the blame on him." The serious charge was made in a statement issued by the Nevada Senator's Washington office, which demanded public exposure of "this new trickery on the part of the Communist-loving clique in the State Department."

Continuing, Senator MALONE said: "These left-wingers have been after General MacArthur's scalp for some time because he stood firm against their scheme, first made evident at Yalta, to turn Asia over to the Communists. Now, since the stupidity, or deliberate treachery, of the Asia policy makers, Hiss, Lattimore, and Acheson, cannot be denied, the followers of this group have the unmitigated gall to spread the lying whisper that General MacArthur was responsible for the surprise attack on South Korea.

"The person who was responsible, who made the wrong decisions, who mothered the stupid notions, who put into force the ill-conceived ideas of the Communist lovers, who in fact never deviated from any of their principles, is Mr. Dean Acheson, Secretary of State.

"At a closed meeting of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Acheson was asked whether he had sought the views of General MacArthur on the strategic importance of Formosa. He answered that he was not reporting on MacArthur's views, that he did not necessarily know them.

"He also said he had not talked to the Joint Chiefs and did not know their views. Three days later, Mr. Acheson made the announcement that America's military defense line in the Pacific ran from the Aleutians to the Philippines, including Japan and Okinawa but skipping Korea and Formosa.

"General MacArthur, far from shaping any of that policy, was not even consulted.

"Is it General MacArthur who determined to withdraw our forces from Korea and leave an ill-equipped constabulary in their place? Is it he who ignored repeated reports of armed raids by Communists across the thirty-eighth parallel, and the urgent warnings from Korean Government officials that heavier attacks were imminent? The answers to these questions are as obvious as the whispered charges against MacArthur are ridiculous."

Administration Ignoring Lower-Income Families

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release dated for October 3, 1950, in which I believe that the administration is turning its backs on the low- and middle-income American families.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, today charged President Truman and the Democratic administration with turning their backs on the low-income and middle-income American families and he offered as evidence the new credit curb on installment buying.

In a statement issued by his Washington office, Senator MALONE said:

"Who is hurt by Mr. Truman's curb on installment buying? Certainly not the wealthy families. They do not need to buy things on the installment plan. The installment-buying plan has been a great blessing to the low-income and middle-income families. It accounts to a great extent for the high standard of living in America, because it brings into the modest homes from coast to coast the things which make better living.

"Had Mr. Truman and his planners had their way in the earlier years of American economy and free enterprise, America today would resemble those miserable European countries where installment buying and other economic advantages are unheard of.

"The President says he must curb the buying power of American families. One of the reasons given for boosting the already high Federal income taxes, you will recall, to siphon off the rise in wages, was to curb buying power and to prevent inflation—raising wages is only another indirect source for increased Federal taxes. I do not think the American people will continue to stand for this kind of subterfuge and interference with their life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

"Mr. Truman has pretended to be the friend of the American worker, but his credit curb on the middle-income group which he has invoked is as bad a stab in the back as the American worker could possibly receive, and it is absolutely unnecessary. Don't let any of the Socialist-minded monetary and credit manipulators tell you the war emergency requires this outrageous step against the people. Other steps can be taken which would make this unnecessary. It has no basis whatsoever in sound national economy.

"The simple fact is the war situation is being used as an excuse for this and other steps toward peacetime regimentation and national socialism. It is part of the softening up process to get us to accept true socialism, which objective is the same as communism, government ownership of property. We have observed the encroachment of socialism, step by step, in our lives but I believe that such affronts as this, to the low-income and middle income American families, will cause the people to awaken to the danger before it is too late."

The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.—The Report Which Was Never Released

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on Communist propaganda.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE METROPOLITAN BROADCASTING CORP.—THE REPORT WHICH WAS NEVER RELEASED

It is basic in the Soviet Communist conspiracy throughout the world that strenuous efforts have been made by them to infiltrate, influence and control propaganda outlets such as newspapers, radio, and moving pictures—so that their insidious poison may be used to influence the people of the world.

Whenever Communist influence obtains control of any source of information within this country, I firmly believe that such a situation should be exposed because it constitutes a serious menace to the security of this country. The American people are entitled to know the facts pertaining to the Communist conspiracy.

I do not stand alone in voicing these opinions. The danger involved in Communist propaganda has been proven time after time.

The notorious Canadian-Russian espionage case contains numerous facts showing that employees in high places in the Canadian Government were recruited for the Soviet espionage system through study clubs, where the philosophies of Karl Marx and Stalin were taught.

One of the findings of the Royal Commission in Canada which investigated the workings of the Soviet camp in that country, was that Soviet agents were out to find Canadians who were willing to betray their country and to supply agents of a foreign power secret information. The Canadian Government found that many of the public servants implicated in working with the Soviet camp Communist conspiracy were persons with an unusually high degree of education, and many were well regarded by those who worked with the agencies and departments of the public service as persons of marked ability and intelligence.

The Royal Commission also found from overwhelming, positive, conclusive evidence—both from the documents and the testimony—that those traitors within the Canadian Government aided the Soviet Communist conspiracy not for monetary gain but because their minds had been poisoned by a political ideology and by the psychological condition received in Communist-front study groups.

In all of the cases investigated by the Royal Commission in Canada, that commission found that those Government employees who became Soviet spies and traitors were recruited from secret cells and study groups controlled or directly influenced by the Communist Party. The Canadian Government also found that a number of Canadian citizens—some employed in high influential positions—were presumably quite ignorant of the espionage conspiratorial network and were innocent of the implication of such activities.

The Canadian Government in its painstakingly thorough investigation has pointed out in its report that every Communist study group is a potential recruiting base of Russian espionage agents. Incidentally, the Canadian Government delivered to this Government a list of over 150 names of American citizens in high places both within our Government and without—names which were obtained from testimony and documentary proof—who were part of a huge espionage conspiracy within the United States.

Those names and facts were delivered to none other than the President of the United States and thereafter there has been complete silence on the part of those in control of the executive branch of our Government relative to those traitorous Americans whose identities were revealed by the investigation of the Canadian Government in Canada.

Today I intend to reveal facts and documentary proof concerning what is known in Washington as the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., operating under the identification of radio station WQQW. Most of these facts, if not all, have been in possession of the executive branch of the Government, as well as the House Un-American Activities Committee, which has been controlled all of these years by the Democratic majority, with the exception of that period of time during the Eightieth Congress when, under Republican leadership, this committee revealed and successfully caused the prosecution of Alger Hiss.

Why these facts have not been given to the American people is obvious.

The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is a corporation, and was granted a conditional license to operate a frequency modulation station in Washington, D. C., by the Federal Communications Commission. The corporation also received a construction permit from the same Commission to erect a standard broadcasting station. The facts concerning this corporation came to the attention of the Democratic-controlled Committee on Un-American Activities as early as 1946.

A detailed report clearly reflects the facts gathered concerning the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and concerning the type of people controlling this corporation and its policies—but, strangely enough, when the facts had been obtained which involved numerous responsible people in the employ of our Federal Government it was never released. I do not know the exact reasons why, other than the fact that the executive branch of our Government, which has been under the control of the Democratic Party these many years, has consistently, on every hand, used every facility to suppress the exposure of subversives within our Federal Government. I think this is obvious to the American public.

I am not going to go into great detail on the facts because I am now putting into the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the report that should have been filed in 1946, so that the true nature of this propaganda outlet in control of the Communist influence can be taken to the American people.

I intend today to mention merely a few of the significant facts concerning the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. which I feel should be emphasized. I also will discuss additional facts obtained by me concerning this radio station developed since the unfiled House committee report of 1946.

In 1946, Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. had approximately 75 stockholders. As of December 1948 this radio station had approximately 200 stockholders. Now, on the basis of facts which are contained in this report which I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, plus the additional facts developed since 1946 regarding these stockholders, let us analyze the people who actually control and operate this station, as far as its policies are concerned. As you know, persons who are not only stockholders of a corporation but who are also creditors of such corporation and, in addition to this, have official business in connection with such a corporation, wield a tremendous influence upon the activities of the corporation.

For your information, six of the stockholders are the largest creditors of radio station WQQW and are affiliated with the Communist Party in the District of Columbia. They are persons who have contributed substantial financial aid to known and cited Communist-front organizations and have furnished funds directly to the Communist Party as well.

In this group of six is included the president of this corporation, Morris Rodman. His brother, Samuel Rodman, and Samuel's wife, Bella Rodman, were called before the House Un-American Activities Committee in June 1949 and refused to answer pertinent questions on the ground of self-incrimination. In addition to these individuals with known Communist Party affiliations and activities who are stockholders and creditors of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Co., let me further advise that 17 of the remaining stockholders of this corporation who wielded influence over its policies, are also considered to be affiliated with the Communist Party in and around Washington, D. C. In addition to this number, 63 additional stockholders are known to have affiliated themselves with one or more dangerous cited Communist Party front groups.

It will be noted from this unfiled House committee report that a great many of these individuals—both the officers of the corporation as well as the stockholders—have been affiliated actively as officers or members of the notorious Communist Party front organization called the Washington Cooperative Bookshop.

The Washington Cooperative Bookshop, I might point out here, is another one of those insidious, dangerous Karl Marx study group clubs on which the efficient FBI obtained such damaging facts that even former Attorney General Biddle cited this organization as subversive and a Communist-front club.

As I have stated before, the Canadian Government ascertained that these Communist-inspired Karl Marx clubs formed the breeding and recruiting grounds for Soviet agents to carry out the Communist conspiracy and the Washington Cooperative Bookshop organization fits to a "T" the very type of organization found to be so dangerous to the security of the Canadian Government in its investigation of the Soviet espionage activities by Government employees and others in Canada.

In addition to this, it is very interesting to note that this report reflects that 28 individuals who are stockholders and directly connected with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Co. are Government employees—many of them employed in very strategic vital positions. Eight of these twenty-eight are employed in none other than Dean Acheson's organization, the State Department; others are employed in the Treasury Department; others were employed in the Navy Department, Office of Research and Inventions; others are employed in the Internal Revenue, Geological Survey, and Department of the Interior.

It has been expressed by many persons responsible for the security of our country that any Government employee who associates with known Communists, or fellow travelers in any enterprise is presenting his own challenge to the Government which pays his salary.

Let me go into detail about some of the persons involved in this corporation on whom facts reflect the party to be clearly a Soviet espionage agent. That is Mary Jane Keeney.

Mary Jane Keeney was a stockholder of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Co. in 1946 and was a stockholder in 1948.

In a report by the House Un-American Activities Committee dated May 24, 25, and June 9, 1949, there is contained the testimony of Phillip O. Keeney and Mary Jane Keeney, and a statement regarding their background. Relative to the Keeneys, this report quotes FBI reports which were introduced as evidence in the Judith Coplon trial. The pertinent facts of the FBI reports are quoted as follows:

"Confidential Informant T-8 advised on August 20, 1945, that Mary Jane Keeney, who was well known on the east coast for her Communist and espionage activities, stated she desired to get into the ICC (Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions) and would look into the job in New York when she next saw Mrs. Florence March, a vice president of the Congress of American Women and a person whom she knew very well.

"With regard to Kournakoff, Informant T-21, of known reliability, has advised that he is identical with Sergei Nikolayivich Kournakoff, was (with aliases), including Colonel Thomas. According to that informant, Kournakoff is a Russian national who came to the United States as a stateless citizen on October 21, 1921. He became affiliated with the Russky Golos Publishing Corp., and wrote articles for the Daily Worker and the New Masses magazine. He departed the United States at New York City on January 30, 1946, and is believed to be in the U. S. S. R. He was a close associate of Mary Jane and Phillip Olin Keeney, who, according to Confidential Informant T-22, were members of the Communist Party. T-22 is a former member of the Communist Party who has furnished considerable information to this office and who assisted in forming numerous front organizations for the Communist Party.

"Confidential Informant T-1 advised that on March 9, 1946, one Mary Jane Keeney arrived in the United States on the steamship Mit Victory at Pier 84, North River, New York City, and was met by Jules Korchein, mentioned hereinbefore, with whom Wasserman was residing at 110 Christopher Street. Mary Jane Keeney was traveling on diplomatic passport No. 418-1, which had been issued at Washington, D. C., on October 22, 1945. Keeney and Korchein were placed under surveillance by Special Agents N. M. Kalmes and the writer, and proceeded to 110 Christopher Street, where they entered the apartment of Wasserman and Korchein. The same informant advised that Keeney was to stay in the apartment and Korchein had made arrangements to leave there and stay in another apartment for the 3 or 4 days Keeney would be in town. On this same date, namely, March 9, 1946, Keeney was placed under surveillance by Special Agents M. M. O'Rourke, J. H. Doyle, and F. J. Nolan, and was observed leaving 110 Christopher Street, New York City. She proceeded to the Murray Hill Restaurant, Park Avenue and Forty-first Street, New York City. At the restaurant, she was joined by an individual, later identified as Joseph Bernstein, suspected of being engaged in Soviet espionage. Keeney was observed passing a manila envelope to Bernstein.

"This same informant advised that on March 11, 1946, Alexander Trachtenberg, secretary-treasurer, International Publishers, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City, held a conference with Joseph M. Bernstein, the individual mentioned previously as having had dinner with Mary Jane Keeney, and, during this conference, Bernstein advised Trachtenberg that he had seen a friend of his who had been on a Government mission in France, and that she had managed to bring in an important will furnished by a first political deputy who had been shot down by the Germans. Trachtenberg indicated that he had been trying to get this will for over a year and at this time it was agreed that Bernstein would bring the will to Trachtenberg's office on March 13, 1946.

"On March 13, 1946, Special Agents M. M. O'Rourke and F. J. Nolan took up a surveillance of Bernstein and it was established that Bernstein was identical with the individual who dined with Keeney on the Saturday night previous and to whom Keeney had given the manila envelope. At the time this surveillance was taken up, on Monday, March 13, 1946, it was observed that Bernstein had in his possession the manila envelope which was believed to be identical to the one Keeney had given to him. The surveillance on Bernstein was undertaken and ultimately led to the office of Alexander Trachtenberg, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

"Phillip Keeney was formerly a librarian, and was employed as such at the University of Montana, and during the latter months of 1945 and in early 1946 was attached to General MacArthur's staff in Japan, heading the organization of libraries in Japan. In late 1946, he was dismissed from his position by the War Department and he returned to the United States. Mary Jane Keeney was formerly employed by the United States Government on a special economic mission and had gone to Europe in October 1945 with this mission, which she was still with at the time of her arrival in the United States in March 1946. At a later date, Mary Jane Keeney resigned her position with this mission. She is presently employed by the United Nations at Lake Success, N. Y., in the editorial department. The Keeneys have been in close contact with Ursula Wasserman since March 1946 to the present time."

FBI reports, which are set out in detail in the reports before the House Un-American Activities Committee dated May and June 1949, clearly reflect that Mary Jane Keeney is considered by the FBI as being a notorious Communist and espionage agent both within and without the United States; and they clearly show the nature of her activities to be that of a Communist courier or espionage agent.

Mary Jane Keeney and her husband have been reliably identified by Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley as associating with and trafficking with numerous members of the Nathan Gregory Silvermaster Russian espionage groups, the Victor Perlo group, and numerous other persons both on the east and the west coasts who formed part of several Soviet espionage rings within this country. It shows also that the Keeneys were very active in the Washington Cooperative Bookshop.

Phillip Keeney and Mary Jane Keeney appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee and as the report reflects both Phillip Keeney and Mary Jane Keeney refused to answer numerous questions as to the people they knew, organizations to which they belonged and their activities underground with the usual stock Communist answer of "self-incrimination."

Mary Jane Keeney resigned her job with the State Department and obtained a job with UN upon State Department recommendation.

In a report of the Committee on Un-American Activities dated June 28, 29, July 6, 12, and 28, 1949, there is included—"Hearings Regarding Communism in the District of Columbia—Part I." This committee makes the following statement, which I feel is very significant.

"We are frank to state that these espionage agents could not have successfully evaded detection—in fact, they could not have operated without the aid of Communist agents working from outside the Government. This is a pattern which has long been typical of Communist operations throughout the world. It is similar to the practice of using outsiders to aid Communists operating within large industrial plants and is known in Communist jargon as concentration. Such concentration rings have, in the past, been known to render the following services to their fellow conspirators within Government agencies or strategic plants:

"1. To furnish financial aid, in some cases running into large sums.

"2. To handle the mechanics of Communist Party membership, dues payments, distribution of directives, literature, etc.

"3. To establish contact with Communist Party officials.

"4. To transmit Government documents and information to Communist Party officials.

"5. To furnish convenient meeting places.

"6. To furnish convenient mailing addresses and drops.

"It should be noted that although some of the witnesses occupy positions of some standing in the business and social world, they have uniformly refused to answer questions on reported Communist affiliations on the ground of self-incrimination. In other words, they have resorted to the same conspiratorial methods of nondisclosure which have characterized known Communists in their appearance before this committee."

The president of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., Morris Rodman, as well as his brother, Samuel Rodman, and Samuel's wife, Bella Rodman, all have been shown to be members of the Communist Party or affiliated very closely with the party, as well as numerous dangerous Communist-front groups and other Communist activities which are almost notoriously known in Washington, D. C.

The following facts on Bella Rodman are contained in the hearings regarding communism in the District of Columbia:

"This individual, according to her testimony, was born in Warsaw, Poland, in December 1902. She presently resides at 3700 Massachusetts Avenue NW., Washington, D. C.

"During the course of the committee's investigation of Bella Rodman, it was reported that she was responsible for the sustaining fund of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia and that she had discussed Communist Party financial affairs with Martin Chancey, former Communist organizer in the District of Columbia.

"She was also reported to the committee as having been a member of the Thomas Jefferson Club of the Communist Party, and her husband, Samuel, although not known as a member of the Communist Party, is reported to have made a contribution through her which was to be used for the benefit of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia.

"In reply to questions regarding the Communist associations set forth above, Mrs. Rodman declined to answer on the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate her."

The following facts are also set out in that report concerning Samuel Rodman:

"This individual stated during his testimony that he was born February 12, 1898, at Joppa, Palestine, and that he is a naturalized citizen of the United States, having received his naturalization papers in the district court of New Brunswick, N. J., in 1927. He stated that he is the husband of Bella Rodman, who has been mentioned hereinbefore.

"During the course of the investigation concerning Samuel Rodman, conducted by the committee, it was ascertained that he had been the recipient of loans totaling more than $2,000,000, which were to be used in the construction of housing enterprises under permission granted by the Federal Housing Administration. The loans secured by Rodman were granted by various private organizations; however, these loans are insured by the Federal Housing Administration, which is not empowered to conduct investigations of applicants for loans from a security standpoint.

"During the committee's investigation, it was reported that Rodman had been associated with the Friends of the Soviet Union, that he had attended Communist Party meetings of a public nature, that he had made contributions for the benefit of the Communist Party in the District of Columbia, through his wife, and that he had discussed Communist Party affairs with Martin Chancey.

"When asked questions regarding the Communist Party associations mentioned hereinbefore, Mr. Rodman refused to answer on the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate him."

The Rodmans have all of the reasons in the world, due to their financial position, to be loyal American citizens; having obtained so much in the way of material wealth under our system of Government. And they have in turn used their money and their efforts in furthering Communist-front causes and Communist Party activities. Their testimony which is reported by the House Un-American Activities Committee for June and July of 1949 contains a pattern of the most insidious type of activities, including their contemptuous type of refusal to answer pertinent questions. The Rodmans are the group which influence so much of the activities and policies of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

Another individual whom I feel I should mention particularly is one of the many State Department employees who were connected with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.; owning an interest in this company and furthering its aims and its policies. He is P. Bernard Nortman.

In connection with P. Bernard Nortman, I insert as an exhibit contents of the actual files contained in the FBI investigation report in detail relative to activities, associates, and contacts of P. Bernard Nortman.

The FBI reports and surveillances reflect that the FBI considered Nortman certainly to be a Russian espionage agent because their surveillance reflects that Nortman had numerous contacts with Victor Perlo, Mary Jane Keeney, whom I have mentioned, Dr. Abraham Weinstein, and none other than William Walter Remington, all of whom were named as Soviet agents—the William Remington who is now under indictment in connection with his Communist activities. This is the William Remington who was on my list.

FBI surveillance reflects Nortman's Communist activities and suspicious contacts in Washington, D. C., and in New York not only with known Soviet agents but numerous underground Communist Party members in Washington, D. C.

By memorandum from J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, to the State Department dated August 23, 1946, it was reflected by actual FBI surveillance that Nortman and William Remington were on an extremely friendly basis and that on September 3, 1946, in addition to contacting William Remington and discussing his job in the Economic Development Section of the State Department, he visited Victor Perlo in the office of Victor Perlo, and Nortman was observed carrying a legal-sized folder of papers into Perlo's office. After conferring with Perlo for approximately 1½ hours, Nortman left his office without such papers and such surveillance clearly indicated Nortman delivered these papers to Victor Perlo.

Victor Perlo, of course, has been named by Government witnesses under oath as being a Soviet espionage agent.

FBI investigation reflects that a reliable confidential informant of the FBI was a member of the Communist Party with P. Bernard Nortman in 1936 in unit "L" of the Harlem section of the Communist Party in New York. Numerous other clear-cut facts, developed by reliable FBI informants, reflect Nortman to have been a member of the Communist Party for a good many years, so when the State Department in June 1947 was furnished with these overwhelming facts by the FBI showing Nortman's membership in the Communist Party, his membership in Communist Party front groups, and his numerous unusual contacts with known Soviet agents, that Department was forced to discharge Nortman; but like so many in that Department they did not turn their back on Nortman. They should have discharged him in such a manner as to prevent further employment in Government service. However, after discharging him in June, his record was revised in November of 1947 which reflects only that he resigned. Nortman continues to be connected as a stockholder wielding influence in the policies of the operation of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

Another person influential in formulating the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. policies and connected with this company as a stockholder is one Selden Menefee.

In a report of the Committee on Un-American Activities, Seventy-ninth Congress, 1946—which was suppressed and not issued, and pertinent parts of which I am inserting into the RECORD, Menefee is described on page 66 as follows:

"He has been a member of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, a Communist front, and so described by an Attorney General of the United States.

"In addition to membership in the Washington Committee for Democratic Action and the Washington Book Shop, Mr. Menefee has also signed a statement on behalf of the Communist Party of the United States which pertained to the purge trials in Moscow, Russia, during the year 1938. The authority for the fact that Menefee signed this statement is the Communist newspaper, the Daily Worker, for April 28, 1938. This statement is entitled 'Statement by American Progressives on the Moscow Trials.' The Moscow trials were conducted in 1938 and they resulted in the wholesale execution of persons considered enemies of Joseph Stalin.

"This report has mentioned the fact that Menefee's book Assignment U. S. A., was the basis of a radio play conducted by the Writer's War Board in 1944. Two members of the Writers' War Board, Arch Oboler and Carlton E. Morse, were associated with the Writers' Congress in 1943. The Writers' Congress is an outgrowth of the League of American Writers which was described in a magazine entitled 'International Literature,' published in Moscow, Russia, as the first revolutionary writers' congress in a capitalist country."

The facts developed concerning Selden Menefee by the FBI were so aggravated relative to his Communist activities and associations, that during the war he applied to the Civil Service Commission for a rating and such rating was refused because of his Communist Party activities and associations. At the time of his application for such rating, he was preparing to lecture to members of the United States Army overseas and this was refused and blocked through military efforts.

The facts furnished by the House Un-American Activities Committee in its report, reflect that Menefee was connected with the Writers' Congress in 1943, described to be a subversive. In this connection I must point out that Owen Lattimore was also connected with the Writers' Congress as a speaker before that group in 1943.

Rose Anderson is a creditor of radio station WQQW to the amount of $500 and also holds 30 shares of stock. In the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, dated June 28 through July 28, 1949, in regard to hearings regarding communism in the District of Columbia, the following facts relative to Rose Anderson are set out on page VII:

"This individual was born in Russia, according to her own statement, 58 or 59 years ago. She entered the United States in 1904 as Rose Leifshitz, her maiden name.

"During the course of the testimony she stated that she had been proprietor of the Investment Pharmacy for a period of 22 years. During the course of the investigation conducted by the committee in connection with the Communist activities of Rose Anderson, it was reported that Mrs. Anderson had made large contributions to the Communist Party of the District of Columbia and that she had been a member of the white-collar branch of the Communist Party in 1944. It was also reported that she had been associated in Communist Party activities with Emanuel Levin, Gertrude Hurney, Thomas Hurney, and James Branca.

"It was also reported to the committee during its investigation that Rose Anderson had been a member of the Thomas Jefferson Club of the Communist Party in 1945.

"In reply to all of the questions propounded to her during the course of the hearing regarding Communist Party activities set forth above, Mrs. Anderson declined to answer on the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate her."

John Anderson, husband of Rose Anderson, is a creditor of radio station WQQW to the amount of $550, holding 10 shares of stock. The following facts relative to him which are set out in the report on hearings regarding communism in the District of Columbia issued by the Committee on Un-American Activities, reflect the following:

"This individual, during his testimony, stated that he had been born in Sweden on May 3, 1895, and that he is the husband of Rose Anderson, who has been discussed previously herein.

"During the course of the committee's investigation, it was reported that John Anderson was a member of the white-collar branch of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia and that meetings of that branch of the Communist Party had been held in his home. He was also reported to have been associated with James Branca in connection with Communist Party activities in the District of Columbia.

"The files of the Committee on Un-American Activities disclose that John Anderson was the treasurer and a member of the executive board of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, according to a letterhead dated June 4, 1947. The committee has cited this organization as subversive in a special report dated June 16, 1947. The files further indicate that John Anderson was affiliated with the Washington branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy and the Washington Committee for Aid to China, both cited as subversive by the Committee on Un-American Activities.

"He was also listed by the Daily Worker of January 9, 1948, page 10, as the vice president of the Maryland Wallace-for-President Committee.

"In reply to questions propounded to him during the course of the hearing afforded him regarding his membership in the Communist Party of the District of Columbia, Mr. Anderson declined to answer on the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate him."

Owen Lattimore and his wife, Eleanor Lattimore, are also stockholders.

The report reflects that since its inception, the Lattimores have alined themselves and actively supported this radio station. As of June 24, 1947, Eleanor Lattimore is a member of the board of directors of this organization.

The House Un-American Activities Committee in 1946 prepared this report which I am inserting into the RECORD for distribution and release. The report you will note furnishes factual background concerning numerous persons connected with the radio station, and it considered Owen Lattimore of sufficient significance to devote a large portion of the report dealing with the personnel of this station to Owen Lattimore, which is quoted as follows:

"STOCKHOLDER OWEN LATTIMORE

"The above-named individual is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. Owen Lattimore has been affiliated with the Writers' Congress of the Hollywood Writers' Mobilization. This organization is a successor of the Pacific coast branch of the League of American Writers, which has been cited as subversive by former Attorney General Biddle. Also it should be stated that the First Congress of the League of American Writers was described in International Literature, a magazine published in Moscow, Russia, as the first congress of revolutionary writers in a capitalist country.

"Owen Lattimore has also been associated with the Amerasia magazine. The managing editor of this magazine, Philip J. Jaffe, was recently convicted of a violation of the security laws of the United States relating to the 'possession of documents stolen from secret Government files.' The documents in question were stolen by various Government employees and made available to Jaffe, who subsequently, it is alleged, made them available to the American Communist Party. The disposition and handling of the case involving Jaffe by various governmental agencies is the subject of an investigation being conducted by another congressional committee. It is alleged as the basis of the investigation that Jaffe and others involved with him were recipients of special favors by certain governmental agencies. Nevertheless, here we find a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., who has been associated with a convicted espionage agent in the publication of a Communist Party line magazine.

"Also, it might be stated here that Philip J. Jaffe is a consultant for the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. Kate L. Mitchell, who was implicated with Jaffe in the espionage case, but who was not convicted, however, is also a consultant for the same organization. Selden Menefee, who is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., who has been mentioned before in this report, is also a sponsor of the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

"This report has pointed out the danger of association between Communists and Government employees because of the opportunities that such association provides for the recruiting of espionage agents. We must therefore consider that the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., has now fallen into the category of a Karl Marx Study Club from which espionage and propaganda agents are recruited. The association of stockholders Menefee and Lattimore with Philip J. Jaffe, a convicted espionage agent, should definitely demonstrate the point. As further evidence of the association of these individuals and the purpose of their association, we need only to point out that the documents involved in the Jaffe espionage case concerned in part the activities of the Chiang Kai-shek government in China. The Amerasia magazine, of which Jaffe is editor, specializes in far-eastern affairs and has been very critical of the Chiang Kai-shek government. Being a Communist Party line publication, the magazine is critical of Chiang Kai-shek and supports the Chinese Communists. One of the documents stolen and turned over to Jaffe contained detailed information concerning the disposition of the troops under Chiang Kai-shek's command, which, of course, is a very valuable document for the Communists to acquire, since Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Communists are now engaged in a civil war. Another document involved was one which described in some detail the entire personal and political background of the Chiang Kai-shek family. This document, of course, was very valuable for the purpose of circulating anti-Chiang Kai-shek propaganda. Some of the other documents involved military secrets of great value, but since they bear no relation to the matter under consideration they will not be discussed here. These documents were found in the possession of Philip Jaffe at the offices of the Amerasia magazine at the time of his arrest by the Federal authorities. Some of these documents apparently were used as the basis of articles condemning the Chiang Kai-shek government and the American State Department's support of Chiang which appeared in Amerasia from time to time.

"Owen J. Lattimore, like Philip J. Jaffee and Kate L. Mitchell, has supported organizations which want to see a communistic government in China."

In 1946 Owen Lattimore, with State Department approval, was busy on an assignment for the executive branch of the Government in Japan advising on reparations during that year.

The House Un-American Activities Committee report which would have given the facts to the American people—the facts to which they are entitled—were suppressed. It was not released. Why?

It is interesting also to note that Eleanor Lattimore and Owen Lattimore listed as their business address as stockholders in this company, 1710 G Street NW., Washington, D. C. At that time it was the identical address of the Washington section of the Institute of Pacific Relations, named as a Communist front and over whose publication Philip Jessup, for some time, had editorial control.

Mrs. Lattimore's phone number was publicly given by that subversive group called the Committee of One Thousand as its official phone.

What is the Committee of One Thousand? The avowed purpose of this committee was to pressure Congress to abolish the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Naturally, the Communists and their fellow-travelers desired to abolish this committee or any other effort on the part of Congress to tell the American people the facts concerning the Communist movement in this country.

Not only does examination of the facts from the report in my hand reflect Communist activities and affiliations on the part of those who control and influence this station, but it should be pointed out that this report also reflects that on questions of foreign policy, the Communist Party has utilized the organization called the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts and Sciences, and the National Citizens Political Action Committee. Both such organizations are closely alined with the third subversive organization called the National Committee to Win the Peace.

All of these organizations were created and controlled by the Communist Party to influence through propaganda and otherwise the foreign policy of the United States in favor of Soviet Russia, and all of these organizations are represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

Thus, as the report reads, we find that these three member organizations created by the Communist Party to affect foreign policy now have an outlet for propaganda supporting its views on foreign policy through the facilities of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

From these facts it would appear that WQQW is completely under Communist control.

This station should not be confused with WPIK, the Virginia station known as the "Metropolitan Network Station."

I think that anyone reading these reports and the reports which I am placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD can have no doubt as to the nature, aims, and purposes of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

INVESTIGATION OF UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES AND PROPAGANDA—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES PURSUANT TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 5, SEVENTY-NINTH CONGRESS

METROPOLITAN BROADCASTING CORP.

Foreword

The above-named corporation is incorporated in the District of Columbia and it has been granted a conditional license to operate a frequency modulation station in Washington, D. C. A construction permit for the erection of this station has been granted by the Federal Communications Commission. The corporation has also received a construction permit from the Federal Communications Commission to erect a standard broadcasting station. In summation, therefore, the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. will have control of two radio outlets which will reach the listening audience in Washington, D. C., and vicinity.

The mere letting of broadcast facilities by the Federal Communications Commission, of course, is not a matter of great import to the Committee on Un-American Activities. However, some alarming facts concerning the grant of these stations to the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. have been brought to the committee's attention.

These facts appear of particular interest when it has become apparent that there are two schools of thought in existence in the United States today on the question of foreign policy. One of these schools believes in wholehearted cooperation with the Soviet Government and the division of the world into two spheres of influence, American and Russian. The other school of thought believes in cooperation with all of the world's nations and the retention of what we may call the status quo insofar as the nations of Europe and Asia are concerned. By the status quo we mean the restoration of the right of self-government to every nation that enjoyed this privilege prior to the outbreak of the Second World War. Also this second group believes in free and unbridled trade between all of the nations of the world. The present foreign policy of the United States is supported by the majority of those persons who fall into the category of the second school of thought, or those who believe in the retention of the status quo.

This difference in thought on the question of foreign policy was recently visibly brought to the attention of the American public when a speech made by Henry Wallace on the question of foreign policy resulted in Mr. Wallace's dismissal as Secretary of Commerce from the President's Cabinet. Mr. Wallace's speech was sponsored by the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions and the National Citizens Political Action Committee. These two organizations are political organizations, and we find that they are in turn closely alined with an organization called the National Committee To Win the Peace. This third organization, the National Committee To Win the Peace, we find is also opposed to the foreign policy of the United States Government. The National Committee To Win the Peace, the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, and the National Citizens Political Action Committee are represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. Thus we find that three organizations opposing the foreign policy of the United States now have an outlet for propaganda supporting their views on foreign policy through the facilities of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

The Communist Party of the United States, of course, supports the foreign policy of the three organizations mentioned. We also find the Communist Party of the United States represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

In addition to the data briefly set forth hereinbefore it is also of interest to note that there is today in the United States a third-party movement which will undoubtedly come into being in the near future. This third-party movement is also represented indirectly among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. The third-party movement through the medium indirectly represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. has a direct representation in a west coast radio station which will be discussed in supplemental data appearing in this report. The third-party movement is supported by the followers of the first school of thought on foreign policy mentioned in this report.

The committee also finds that there has been a very close connection between employees of the Federal Communications Commission and the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

Further, the committee also finds that one prospective stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp has openly avowed her belief in Karl Marx philosophy and radicalism in a magazine article which she wrote not too many years ago for a Communist-front publication.

It is of further interest to note that represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. are approximately 10 individuals who have held membership in the Washington Book Shop, a Communist enterprise.

The committee's investigation has also developed the connection of two present employees of Members of Congress with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. These two Members of Congress are supported by the three organizations which we have mentioned herein, that is to say, the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions; the National Citizens Political Action Committee; and the National Committee To Win the Peace, and in this same connection we also find that two former employees of subcommittees of the United States Senate are represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. The committee's investigation reflects that although these individuals indicated they were employees of the Senate in documents submitted to the Federal Communications Commission the committee finds they were actually employees of the Interior and Navy Departments and had been loaned to the senatorial subcommittees. The subcommittees of the Senate for which these two persons worked were headed by two Senators who are also sponsored by the same organizations mentioned hereinbefore.

All in all the committee finds that the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. are a closely knit group of individuals who have identified themselves with numerous Communist-front groups, the Communist Party, and certain political organizations.

Each of the phases of the investigation mentioned hereinoefore will be developed more fully as this report continues under various subheadings.

Stockholders and employees of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and the Federal Communications Commission

Edward M. Brecher is general manager of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. He is a former employee of the Federal Communications Commission, which has granted broadcasting privileges to the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. Brecher was an employee of the Federal Communications Commission at the time the corporation referred to herein filed its application for the construction permit to erect the frequency-modulation station. The application for this permit was filed with the Federal Communications Commission on October 8, 1945. Brecher did not resign from the Commission until February 11, 1946. The permit for the construction of the frequency-modulation station was granted on August 9, 1946, some time after Brecher's resignation took effect.

The application for the construction of the standard broadcasting station by the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. was filed on March 4, 1946, before the Federal Communications Commission. This was filed approximately 1 month after Mr. Brecher's resignation.

One witness before the committee has testified in executive session that Mr. Brecher has told acquaintances that he engineered the entire matter when it was presented to the Federal Communications Commission. However, the Federal Communications Commission has advised a Member of the House of Representatives that Mr. Brecher did not take part in the processing of the applications filed by the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. with the Federal Communications Commission. In this connection, however, it has been noted by the committee that the testimony taken before the Federal Communications Commission in connection with the applications of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. fails to mention the fact that Mr. Brecher had been an employee of the Federal Communications Commission.

It is interesting to note, however, that Mr. Brecher did testify before the Federal Communications Commission that—

"The majority of the stockholders have been brought in by myself from among friends, associates and friends of friends and associates since February 13. Prior to that time I can only give you hearsay."

This statement makes it fairly clear that all of the persons associated in this enterprise are well known to each other and that in all probability they have the same political views and social philosophy. Clearly from the evidence compiled the group of persons represented in this enterprise belong to the school of thought that believes in further appeasement of Soviet Russia, and the liquidation of the British Empire, as well as the relegation of Great Britain into a secondary power in world affairs. Also some of the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. have demonstrated through their association with known Communists and Communist fellow travelers that they belong in that category of individuals who believe that they can associate with Communists without betraying the country of their birth and in some cases the country that gave them refuge.

Before leaving the subject of employees of the Federal Communications Commission and the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. it is of interest to note that Clark Foreman, one of the stockholders, is president of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. Mrs. Virginia Durr, the wife of Commissioner Clifford V. Durr of the Federal Communications Commission, is a vice president of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. The Southern Conference for Human Welfare has been identified as a transmission belt of the Communist Party by none other than Earl Browder, former head of the Communist Party of the United States.

H. Richard Seller, one of the stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., is an employee of Congressman Hugh De Lacy of the State of Washington. Congressman

De Lacy is supported politically by the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions and the National Citizens Political Action Committee. Congressman De Lacy was also a sponsor of the National Committee To Win the Peace. As this report has stated these three organizations support the foreign-policy views of Henry A. Wallace which caused the recent rift in the President's Cabinet.

Curtis E. Johnson, another stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., is an employee of Congressman Ned Healy of the State of California. Congressman Healy, like his colleague Congressman De Lacy, is also supported by the three organizations mentioned hereinbefore.

The fact that stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. are employees of Members of the House of Representatives is not of great import, however, when we consider that fellow travelers of the Communist Party are also stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. as well as two members of the Communist Party as testified to, in executive session, the fact that employees of Members of Congress are stockholders in the group becomes a matter of interest to the American people.

The committee would also like to bring to the public's attention the fact that two other stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. have been employees of subcommittees of the United States Senate. One of these stockholders, Bernard LeRoy, is an employee of the United States Navy Department. On the mimeographed list of stockholders presented to the Federal Communications Commission by the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. it is indicated that Mr. LeRoy is an employee of the United States Senate. However, the committee's investigation reflected that Mr. LeRoy was not an employee of the Senate, but was temporarily loaned to a subcommittee of the Senate headed by Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of the State of Florida. Senator PEPPER is sponsored politically by the same three organizations which sponsor Congressmen DeLacy and Healy. Senator PEPPER, it should be recalled, was a speaker with Henry A. Wallace on the program sponsored by the National Citizens Political Action Committee and the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions which led to Mr. Wallace's resignation from the Cabinet after much criticism had been leveled at his speech on foreign policy.

Another stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is one Ann S. Gertler, an employee of the United States Department of the Interior. On the mimeographed list of stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. submitted to the Federal Communications Commission it is indicated that Miss Gertler is an employee of the United States Senate. The investigation conducted by the committee, however, reflects that Miss Gertler was actually employed by the Interior Department, but had been temporarily loaned to a senatorial subcommittee headed by Senator HARLEY M. KILGORE, of the State of West Virginia. Senator KILGORE is also sponsored by the National Citizens Political Action Committee and the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. The Communist Party of the United States openly takes credit for the establishment of the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, and one Communist Party statement in this regard appears rather significant. This statement by a Communist was:

"We built the Independent Citizens Committee and it has developed into a powerful political weapon."

Here again we have evidences of employees of the legislative bodies of the United States Government associating with known Communists and fellow travelers of the Communist Party of the United States.

Other Government employees and the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

Listed among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. we find the names of the following governmental employees and their places of employment:

Leonard Ackerman, Internal Revenue.
Robert C. Davenport, Agriculture.
Philip H. Dunaway, State.
Maynard Gertler, State.
Marcus I. Goldman, Geological Survey.
Arthur Goldschmidt, Interior.
Carl P. Green.
Ruth Gruber, Interior.
Albert E. Hussey, Agriculture.
Kelley E. Lowell, commander, United States Naval Reserve, Navy Department, Office of Research and Inventions.
Larry L. Leonard, Treasury.
Harry J. London, Social Security.
Milton Lowenthal, Agriculture.
Just Lunning, lieutenant, United States Naval Reserve, State.
Alice R. G. MacLean, State.
David R. Mendelson, Office of Price Administration.
C. Roy Murphy, Agriculture.
P. Bernard Nortman, State (since been allowed to resign).
Forrester Raymond, Agriculture.
Dorothy E. Richardson (Mrs. Dorothy R. Adler), Treasury.
Chet Sinclair, State.
H. Bowen Smith, State.
Pierson Underwood, State.
Gerhard P. Van Arkel (assistant general counsel), National Labor Relations Board.

Here we have 24 individuals, in addition to the 4 we have mentioned previously, employed in various sections of the United States Government, who are stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. It is to be noted that some of these persons are employed in strategic positions.

The committee feels that any Government employee who associates with known Communist and Communist fellow travelers in any enterprise is presenting his own challenge as to whether he is loyal to the Government which pays his salary.

As will be shown later in this report some of the persons named above have been associated with the Communist enterprise known as the Washington Book Shop, as well as with other Communist-front organizations.

The Committee on Un-American Activities does not challenge the right of Government employees to hold stock in a radio enterprise. The committee does, however, challenge the right of any Government employee, or official for that matter, to become closely connected with any organization that obviously intends to promote another outlet for the philosophy of Karl Marx as so many of the stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. did when they formed or became associated with the Washington Book Shop. The best illustration of this point insofar as the danger of association between Government employees and Communists is concerned is contained in the report of the Royal Commission of the Canadian Government which investigated the Russian espionage system in Canada recently.

The report of the Royal Commission contains this statement in the chapter entitled "Motivation of Agents":

"Perhaps the most startling single aspect of the entire fifth-column network is the uncanny success with which the Soviet agents were able to find Canadians who were willing to betray their country and to supply to agents of a foreign power secret information to which they had access in the course of their work, despite oaths of allegiance, of office, and of secrecy which they had taken. Many of the public servants implicated in this espionage network were persons with an unusually high degree of education and many were well regarded by those who worked with them in agencies and departments of the public service, as persons of marked ability and intelligence."

The report then states:

"There is no evidence that monetary incentive played an important part in the original motivation of these persons whose ideology was sympathetic to the Communist cause, who agreed to act as espionage agents. On the contrary the evidence is overwhelming both from the documents and the testimony of several such agents themselves that their original motivation was a product of their political ideology and of the psychological conditioning received in the study groups."

The report says that:

"In virtually all cases the agents were recruited from among cells or study groups of secret members or adherents of the Communist Party."

Another paragraph in the report states:

"The inquiry has revealed the names of a number of Canadians, employed in various departments and agencies of the Government, who, while presumably quite ignorant of the espionage network and certainly innocent of implication in such illegal activities, were being subjected to development by the same means for use in the future."

The Canadian report has therefore definitely and upon the basis of factual evidence pointed out that every Communist "study club" is a potential recruiting base of Russian espionage agents through psychological development of its members.

The Government employees who are stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and who have been members of the Carl Marx Study Club, known as the Washington Book Shop, have therefore again placed themselves in jeopardy and the Government employing them as well. As this report has stated there are at least two known members of the Communist Party associated with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

Further, there are at least two persons who are regular contributors to the Communist Party and the wife of one of these is in charge of the sustaining fund maintained by the Communist Party of the District of Columbia.

The Washington Book Shop

The Washington Book Shop also known as the Washington Cooperative Book Shop was so obviously an enterprise of the Communist Party that it would have been impossible for any politically informed persons to walk into it without perceiving its Communist character.

Particular attention is directed to the findings of the Attorney General Mr. Francis Biddle contained in exhibit No. 1 which follows:

"EXHIBIT No. 1

"MEMORANDUM OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, MR. BIDDLE

"(Strictly confidential)

"WASHINGTON COOPERATIVE BOOK SHOP

"NOTE.—The following statement does not purport to be a complete report on the organization named. It is intended only to acquaint you, without undue burden of detail, with the nature of the evidence which has appeared to warrant an investigation of charges of participation.

"It is assumed that each employee's case will be decided on all the facts presented in the report of the FBI and elicited, where a hearing is ordered, by the board or committee before which the employee is given an opportunity to appear.

"Please note that the statement is marked 'strictly confidential' and is available only for use in administration of the mandate of Public No. 135.

"The Washington Cooperative Book Shop, under the name, the Book Shop Association, was incorporated in the District of Columbia in 1938 for the stated purposes of providing a meeting place for persons interested in literary and cultural activities, providing for the cooperative purchase and resale of literature and works of art for the profit of its members as consumers, maintaining a renting library and ticket service and fostering other activities of a literary, educational, and cultural nature. The association is a nonstock corporation operated on the cooperative plan, with nine trustees elected by the membership, which, according to its announcements, have numbered 1,000. It maintains a book shop and art gallery at 916 Seventeenth Street NW., Washington, D. C., where literature is sold and meetings and lectures are held.

"Evidence of Communist penetration or control is reflected in the following: Among its stock the establishment has offered prominently for sale books and literature identified with the Communist Party and certain of its affiliates and front organizations, including works on the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, reports concerning American Youth Congress, literature of American Peace Mobilization, articles on the Young Communist League, and Communist periodicals, such as New Masses. In this connection the Washington News of May 22, 1941, reported that the Washington delegates to the people's convention of the American Peace Mobilization at New York City in that year were advised that only at the Washington Cooperative Book Shop could they buy literature approved by that organization. Information received from confidential sources indicates that certain of the officers and employees of the book shop, including its manager and executive secretary, have been in close contact with local officials of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia. One member of the association has reported that he received literature, unsolicited, from the Communist Party of the District of Columbia, a circumstance which he attributed only to his membership in the association. In May 1941 Joseph Starobin, one of the editors of New Masses and a teacher at the Communist Party Workers School in New York City, lectured at the book shop, reportedly following the Communist Party line of that day, stressing the invincibility of the Soviet Union and criticizing the Roosevelt administration. A quantity of literature of the type above described was displayed near the entrance of the book shop on that occasion.

"In May 1941, the book shop desired to promote a membership drive and solicited the cooperation of the Cooperative League of the District of Columbia. The league, having received reports that the book shop was Communist controlled, requested it to provide certain information. The information was not furnished and the book shop resigned from the league, stating it was doing so as a result of unfavorable publicity attached to the incident. At about the same time the Washington press carried news items reporting seizure by representatives of the Dies committee of a membership list of the book shop allegedly initialed to indicate those members who were regarded as Stalinists. A meeting of the members of the book shop denied Communist control, and thereafter adopted a resolution disclaiming Communist domination and affirming adherence to the foreign policy of the administration.

"In view of the nature of the enterprise, investigations of charges of participation in the Washington Cooperative Book Shop have been restricted to exclude mere patrons or subscribers and to include only those fairly charged with participation in its administration."

The following letter written by the manager of the Washington Book Shop is also of interest:

"EXHIBIT No. 2

The Washington Book Shop Association—affiliated with the District of Columbia Cooperative League

These two exhibits in themselves should convince even the skeptical that the Washington Book Shop was a study club of the type described by the report of the Royal Commission of the Canadian Government which we mentioned in a previous paragraph.

However, the Washington Book Shop itself has furnished additional evidence of the communistic nature of the enterprise through the type of programs it sponsors and the nature of the persons who have appeared on these programs.

For instance, during the year 1943 one Fanning W. Halle, a Russian propagandist, appeared before an audience sponsored by the Washington Book Shop and lectured on the subject, No Weaker Sex in the Soviet Union. Miss Halle is the author of several books containing Soviet propaganda; two of these were entitled "Women in Soviet Russia," and "Women in the Soviet East."

Another individual who appeared before a Washington Book Shop audience in 1943 was Murko Markovich who spoke on the subject, The Truth About Yugoslavia. In his address Markovich condemned General Mihailovich who was recently executed by the present regime in Yugoslavia which is under the control of one Josef Broz, alias Marshal Tito. This individual is a Communist. During the period when Markovich appeared oefore the Washington Book Shop audience, Tito and Mihailovich were the leaders of two opposing political factions in Yugoslavia. Each faction hoped ultimately that in the event of an Allied victory it would succeed in taking over the reins of government. The Tito faction was supported by the American Communist Party and the Washington Book Shop. The purpose of the American Communist Party was, of course, to secure sympathy and financial assistance for the faction known as the Partisans which was headed by Marshal Tito. In order to achieve this purpose, the American Communist Party set up several front groups in the United States among the persons of Slavic descent. Also the Communist Party furthered this aim by distributing literature among so-called sympathetic intellectual groups such as the Washington Book Shop. It also indirectly sponsored lecturers such as Markovich to appear before these intellectual groups. The purpose of the literature distribution and the sponsoring of lecturers was to condemn Mihailovich and praise the Communist Tito.

The front groups set up among the American Slavs were:

The American Slav Congress,

The United Committee of South Slavic Americans,

The American Committee for Yugoslav Relief, and

The Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee.

If one wonders whether these groups were successful in their purpose we need only to resort to our own common knowledge, for Marshal Tito today rules Yugoslavia with an iron hand.

It is apparent that the Washington Book Shop as early as 1943 assisted the American Communists in their scheme to install Tito in Yugoslavia. It is openly admitted by the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee that it was the agency which installed Tito in power in Yugoslavia.

Further information concerning the Slavic Communist-front groups in the United States and their relation to the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. will be set forth later in this report.

On April 2, 1943, the Washington Book Shop membership and supporters were entertained by one "Woody" Guthrie. Mr. Guthrie is an entertainer who has been serving the Communists in many enterprises for a number of years. One may wonder why it is necessary to set forth any information concerning a mere singer in any report on communism. However, the American public should be fully aware by now that even music plays a part in the communistic scheme to take over the United States. Revolutionists know that the music of many of our songs as well as the words contained therein play a part in the emotional structure of everyone.

Not only do the Communists realize that revolutionary songs stir the emotions of a propagandized people, but they also realize the fact that entertainers can assist them financially, either through donations from their own funds or through donations of their time and talent. Also the audience listening to the entertainment will very often, if pleased at the performance, willingly donate funds above the price of admission to any enterprise sponsored or propagandized during the course of the performance.

"Woody" Guthrie, or Woodrow Wilson Guthrie, as he is actually named, is at present connected with an organization called Peoples Songs, Inc. This organization is an outgrowth of the organization called the Almanac Singers. The Almanac Singers was cited as a Communist-front organization by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities on March 29, 1944, after an exhaustive study and investigation.

Although Peoples Songs, Inc., has denied that it is an outgrowth of the Communist-front group called the Almanac Singers we need only to examine the records to disprove this denial. For instance, Lee Hays and Peter Seeger are members of the executive committee of Peoples Songs, Inc. These individuals were not only connected with the Almanac Singers, but they wrote some of the songs used by the Almanac Singers for the nefarious purpose of carrying out the musical phase of the Communist Party line. As an illustration the committee cites that phase of the Communist Party line which was followed by the United States Communist Party during the period of the Hitler-Stalin pact. During the period of this pact the American Communist Party did everything in its power to defeat any preparatory defense measures the United States Government sought to enact such as lend-lease to Britain and the Selective Service Act. One of these fronts, the American Peace Mobilization, even used a song written by Lee Hays and Peter Seeger, of the Almanac Singers, which went like this:

"Oh, Franklin Roosevelt told how the people felt;
We damn near believed what he said;
He said, I hate war and so does Eleanor,
But he won't be safe till everybody's dead."

Thus in the days of lend-lease to Britain, the Selective Service Act, and the Hitler-Stalin pact, Franklin D. Roosevelt was a warmonger. Today, however, to Peoples Songs, Inc., Peter Seeger and Lee Hays, Franklin D. Roosevelt, their one-time enemy, has become their friend. The enmity of Seeger and Hays for Mr. Roosevelt ceased the day Hitler attacked Stalin's Russia. This friendship for the late President insofar as the communistic musical world is concerned has now been immortalized by Peoples Songs, Inc., in the form of a printed statement in the April 1946 issue of Peoples Songs, Inc. This statement is: "One year ago this month, Franklin D. Roosevelt died, and to his memory and the ideals of world peace and freedom for which he fought, the issue is dedicated." Thus, a President of the United States once defamed in song by Seeger and Hays has now been immortalized by them, but only because it suits their present purpose and the purpose of the Communist party of the United States.

Mr. Guthrie's association with the Communist Party is not limited to his appearance before the Washington Book Shop nor to the Peoples Songs, Inc., headed by Seeger and Hays, for the committee finds that as late as June 28, 1946, Mr. Guthrie further assisted the fund-raising technique and propaganda dissemination of the Communist Party by appearing at a communistic gathering in Washington, D. C. This function was called the Memorial Meeting To Honor Sam Banks, Young Communist Leader in Washington and Maryland. The gathering was sponsored by the Sam Banks' Youth Club, Communist Party of the District of Columbia. Speakers on the program were William Taylor, chairman of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia, and Irving Goff, New York State veterans' director of the Communist Party. Mr. Guthrie's association with the function was listed as an entertainer from Peoples Songs, Inc., New York City, N. Y.

From the data set forth herein it is apparent that the Washington Book Shop during the year 1943 even followed the musical phase of the Communist Party line.

Another individual who appeared before a Washington Book Shop audience was Anna Louise Strong, one of the outstanding communistic propaganda writers in the United States. Miss Strong has written a book on every phase of life in Soviet Russia, always from the viewpoint of the pro-Communist. Miss Strong has also written numerous books which were designed to secure sympathy for the puppet communistic regimes set up in European countries after their liberation by the Allies.

Ruth McKenney, who was recently expelled from the Communist Party of the United States because of a difference in views with the controlling powers of the Communist Party, has also appeared before Washington Book Shop members. Ruth McKenney still proclaims her belief in communism, even though she has been expelled from the party.

In this connection and aside from the issue of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and the Washington Book Shop it is interesting to note that Ruth McKenney and her husband, Richard Bransteen, or Bruce Minton, as he is more popularly known, were expelled from the Communist Party of the United States because they supported the views of Earl Browder deposed head of the Communist Party over those of William Z. Foster present head of the United States Communist Party. This example of the fact that free speech among Communists is not tolerated should not be overlooked.

One other individual whom we should not overlook in this discussion is Howard Fast. This individual has also lectured before the Washington Book Shop. Howard Fast has been a member of the executive board of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee. Seventeen of the officers of this Communist-front organization have been cited for contempt because they refused to testify before the Committee on Un-American Activities and because they refused to produce documents and records concerning their activities. The organization has steadfastly maintained that it is engaged in relief work, yet Howard Fast, in his book entitled "The Incredible Tito," makes the following statement:

"The Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee provided funds and means for Tito's return to Yugoslavia."

In other words, the American public has contributed funds to an organization supposedly engaged in relief work, but the funds were used for the political purpose of installing Tito as dictator of Yugoslavia. The reason why the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee refused to permit an examination of its books and records should now appear quite apparent.

In addition to his work on the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, Howard Fast is also a regular contributor to the Communist publications called the Daily Worker and the New Masses. Howard Fast is an associate editor of this latter publication. Here, again, we have evidence of the communistic connections of the Washington Book Shop and the fact that it was used to disseminate propaganda in favor of a Yugoslavian Communist, Marshal Tito, who has become a stumbling block on the pathway to world peace.

Corliss Lamont, the foremost exponent of communism in the United States, has also lectured before the Washington Book Shop. Lamont has also been cited for contempt by the House of Representatives because his organization refused to produce its books and records for examination by the Committee on Un-American Activities. Mr. Lamont has made statements to the effect that communism will come to the entire world in the future. Mr. Lamont has also written a book entitled "You Might Like Socialism." Mr. Lamont is chairman of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, which has consistently issued propaganda in favor of the Soviet. It has never praised the Government of the United States and has taken strong issue with both Great Britain and the United States on matters of foreign policy.

The Committee on Un-American Activities has not been able to examine the records of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, but it does know that the Amtorg Trading Corp., a registered agency of the Soviet Government, has solicited contributions to the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship from various manufacturers in the United States for the purpose of having books published which were supposedly sent to the Soviet Union by the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship. The committee knows that the minimum possible collection by Amtorg for the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship was $22,500.

Mr. Lamont is also a frequent contributor to the publication entitled "Soviet Russia Today." This magazine was in part financed by the Sound View Foundation, a notorious Communist financing organization.

Here again is evidence of the association between the Washington Book Shop and the entire communistic movement in the United States.

Another individual who has appeared before the membership of the Washington Book Shop as a lecturer is Selden Menefee. This individual is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. Further information concerning Mr. Menefee will be found later in this report.

Government employees who are stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and who have held membership in the Washington Book Shop

Among the Government employees who are stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and who have held membership in the Washington Book Shop are the following individuals:

Robert C. Davenport, United States Department of Agriculture.

Marcus I. Goldman, United States Geological Survey.

Arthur E. Goldschmidt, United States Department of the Interior.

Ruth Gruber, United States Department of the Interior.

Milton Lowenthal, United States Department of Agriculture.

C. Roy Murphy, United States Department of Agriculture.

With reference to Arthur E. Goldschmidt it should be stated that he has also held membership in the American League for Peace and Democracy which was a notorious Communist-front organization and so cited by a number of investigative agencies. Among these citations appear the following:

1. The American League for Peace and Democracy was a Communist transmission belt originally organized and controlled by the Communist Party, carrying out its instructions as an affiliate of the Communist International in Moscow. (Citation from the New York City Council Committee Investigating the Municipal Civil Service Commission, pt. 2, p. 66.)

2. Cited as an organization in which Communists have controlling influence by the Massachusetts House Committee Report on Un-American Activities, 1938, page 77.

3. Cited as a Communist-front organization by Pennsylvania Commonwealth counsel before the reviewing board of the Philadelphia County Board of Assistance, January 1942.

4. Cited as a Communist front by the California Committee on Un-American Activities, report for 1943, page 91.

5. Established in 1937 as successor to the American League Against War and Fascism.

"The American League for Peace and Democracy was designed to conceal Communist control, in accordance with the new tactics of the Communist International." (Attorney General's citation, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 88, pt. 6, p. 7443.)

6. "Established in the United States in an effort to create public sentiment on behalf of a foreign policy adapted to the interests of the Soviet Union." (P. 7442 of citation 5 above.)

Citation 6 is particularly important not only with respect to the American League for Peace and Democracy and its purpose to create sympathy for the Soviet foreign policy, but we must remember that this report has disclosed that the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is alined with interests supporting present-day foreign policy of the Soviet Union.

Through his association with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., Mr. Goldschmidt has again alined himself with an organization identified with the Communist movement in the United States and an organization supporting the foreign policies of other nations against that of the United States.

Mr. Goldschmidt has also been associated with the Communist front known as the International Labor Defense. This organization is the legal arm of the Communist Party of the United States. It has been cited as a Communist front by Attorney General Francis Biddle, and by several State, Federal, and municipal investigative bodies.

Mr. Goldschmidt has also donated money to the Friends of Spanish Democracy, another Communist front.

Further, Mr. Goldschmidt has also been associated with the National Negro Congress at several of its functions. This organization has been cited by former members and by the Attorney General as a Communist front as well as by several investigative committees of State and Federal Governments.

Mr. Goldschmidt has also subscribed to the New Masses, a Communist publication.

The wife of this individual has also been a member of the Washington Book Shop. She, too, is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

With reference to Robert C. Davenport, it should be stated that he has also been a member of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action as well as the Washington Book Shop. The Washington Committee for Democratic Action has been described as an affiliate of the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, another Communist-front organization, by the Attorney General of the United States.

With reference to Marcus I. Goldman, it should be stated that he was a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy, which was as this report has shown, a Communist-front organization. However, when Mr. Goldman testified before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities he denied that he had held membership in the American League for Peace and Democracy. The Special Committee on Un-American Activities, however, to support its charges obtained through a subpena an original questionnaire which had been executed by Mr. Goldman as a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy.

Mr. Goldman also testified before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities that he had contributed $500 toward the defense of one Angelo Herndon, a well-known Communist and a member of the national committee of the Communist Party of the United States, who was arrested and convicted for insurrection in the State of Georgia.

Mr. Goldman testified before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities that he had also contributed $500 to the International Labor Defense which is as this report has indicated the legal arm of the Communist Party of the United States.

In addition to the two contributions mentioned above it should further be noted that Mr. Goldman has also contributed funds to the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, another front and so described by the Attorney General of the United States.

Further, it should also be noted that Mr. Goldman has admitted that he was a subscriber to the New Masses and the Daily Worker, both official publications of the Communist Party of the United States. Also it should be noted that for a number of years Mr. Goldman was the holder of $5,000 worth of bonds of the Soviet Union.

The committee can conceive that these Government employees might possibly have been led into membership in the Washington Book Shop, but the other evidence against them and in particular their present association with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. seems to indicate that they were well acquainted with the communistic aims of all of the groups mentioned.

It is perhaps fitting to mention here that the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, John Edgar Hoover, has recently stated that the time for loyal Americans to stand up and be counted has come.

The Un-American Activities Committee agrees with Mr. Hoover, and it further coincides with his belief that actual Communists and Communist sympathizers can no longer hide under the cloak of liberalism.

Other stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. who have held membership in the Washington Book Shop and/or other Communist-front organizations

Among the other stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. who have held membership in the Washington Book Shop are the following individuals: Carl P. Green, Selden C. Menefee, Samuel J. Rodman, David Wahl, Samuel Lichtenstein, Morris Rodman, Morris Sharnoff, and Mrs. Luke I. Wilson.

With reference to David Wahl it is of interest to note that he has also been an employee of the United States Government. At one time he was employed by the Library of Congress. According to information furnished the old Special Committee on Un-American Activities, David Wahl was the leader of the Communist unit in the Congressional Library.

In addition to his membership in the Washington Book Shop, David Wahl has also been a member of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, which has been described as a Communist front previously in this report.

Morris Sharnoff, whose name is mentioned above, has also in addition to his membership in the Washington Book Shop been a member of the Communist front called the Washington Committee for Democratic Action.

Samuel Lichtenstein has also been a member of the Washington Book Shop and the Washington Committee for Democratic Action.

The wife of one of the individuals whose name appears in this section of the report has been identified by a witness in executive session before the Committee on Un-American Activities as being responsible for the sustaining fund of the Communist Party in the District of Columbia.

Two individuals mentioned in this section of the report are regular contributors to the sustaining fund of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia.

With reference to Selden C. Menefee it should be stated that he has appeared before the Washington Book Shop as a lecturer on certain subjects. He is also the author of a book entitled "Assignment: U. S. A." A radio play based upon this book was adopted by the Writers War Board and presented by the National Broadcasting Corp. on February 22, 1944. This play based on Mr. Menefee's book definitely belittles the Americans of Irish descent and makes some caustic statements concerning them, particularly with regard to the Irish living in Boston. Mr. Menefee's book and the play based on it are not the only mediums through which Menefee has attacked the Irish and the Irish Catholics in the United States. In a newspaper article appearing in a Washington newspaper on June 10, 1943, Menefee attacked the Irish Catholics of Brooklyn, N. Y.

The article was the subject of an open letter written to the editor of the Washington newspaper by the editor of the Baltimore Catholic Review. The open letter is quoted in part as follows:

"In these days above all days when we have a duty to foster unity among all classes, Mr. Selden Menefee, one of your columnists, throws in the torch that might set afire racial antagonisms."

In the book, the play, and the newspaper column mentioned Mr. Menefee indicated that the Irish Catholics were anti-Semitic and he belittles their contribution to the war effort.

Mr. Menefee according to the open letter mentioned above and quoted in part seems to be a master of the art of the Communist strategy of setting one group against another.

Certainly in his association with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. he has become associated with a group that intends to stir up the Negro population of Washington, for in their testimony before the Federal Communications Commission they openly stated that the Negro is to receive special consideration in their programing. Also it is of interest to note that one stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. was associated with Paul Robeson in the delegation that called upon President Harry S. Truman and threatened the city of Washington, D. C., with a race riot in the event the Federal Government failed to take action to prevent any further lynchings of Negroes.

It is a well-known fact that the Communists in the United States are leading the agitation among the various racial groups in the United States. It appears that those associated with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. have identical views regarding racial agitation. The record of Selden C. Menefee a stockholder in this corporation seems to bear out this conclusion.

In addition to the information concerning Menefee recorded hereinbefore it is also of interest to note that he has been a member of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, a Communist front and so described by an Attorney General of the United States.

In addition to membership in the Washington Committee for Democratic Action and the Washington Book Shop, Mr. Menefee has also signed a statement on behalf of the Communist Party of the United States which pertained to the purge trials in Moscow, Russia, during the year 1938. The authority for the fact that Menefee signed this statement is the Communist newspaper, the Daily Worker, for April 28, 1938. This statement is entitled "Statement by American Progressives on the Moscow Trials." The Moscow trials were conducted in 1938 and they resulted in the wholesale execution of persons considered enemies of Joseph Stalin.

This report has mentioned the fact that Menefee's book Assignment U. S. A. was the basis of a radio play conducted by the Writers' War Board in 1944. Two members of the Writers' War Board, Arch Oboler and Carlton E. Morse, were associated with the Writers' Congress in 1943. The Writers' Congress is an outgrowth of the League of American Writers which was described in a magazine entitled "International Literature," published in Moscow, Russia, as the first "revolutionary writers' congress in a capitalistic country."

Another individual named above, Mrs. Luke I. Wilson, in addition to her membership in the Washington Book Shop has also been associated with the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, described by Earl Browder, former head of the Communist Party in the United States, as a transmission belt for Communist propaganda.

Organizations represented in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. through Stockholder Clark Foreman

Among the other stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. we find the name of Clark Foreman. This individual is president of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. He is a member of the executive committee of the National Citizens Political Action Committee. Mr. Foreman has also been a member of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action which has been identified as a Communist front by an Attorney General of the United States. Mr. Foreman is also interested in the National Committee To Win the Peace and has also been associated with the schools for political action conducted by the National Citizens Political Action Committee.

In effect therefore the National Citizens Political Action Committee now has a radio outlet in the District of Columbia for its own political propaganda. This fact alone should interest those Members of Congress who have been nominated in the past and who will be nominated in the future as political opponents of the National Citizens Political Action Committee. The Democratic and Republican Parties have no direct outlets for political propaganda such as has been created under the sponsorship of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

It should also be of interest to note that the efforts of the National Citizens Political Action Committee, to secure outlets for political propaganda through the use of radio broadcasting facilities, has not been confined to the District of Columbia. Efforts in this direction are being made in California at the present time through a group of individuals who have formed a corporation named the Hollywood Community Radio Group which has among its membership at least one known member of the Communist Party and numerous fellow travelers of the Communist Party. It is not known at this writing whether the group will be successful in securing radio outlets in the vicinity of Los Angeles, Calif., but it is not wholly without representation at the present time in the State of California. The National Citizens Political Action Committee is represented in the membership of the Hollywood Community Radio Group. It has a direct representation in Washington, D. C., through the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. and it has an outlet in the State of California at present through Bartley C. Crum who is president of radio station KLAC in Hollywood, Calif. Bartley C. Crum has associated with several Communist-front groups and has recently publicly announced that he favors the formation of a third party group in the United States.

Bartley C. Crum and Clark Foreman are both members of the National Committee To Win the Peace, a so-called liberal organization. Director J. Edgar Hoover of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has recently called attention to the fact that Communists in America are hiding under the false cloak of liberalism. Certainly the American liberals or so-called liberals have not divorced themselves from the taint of communism, and have not made any effort to remove the Communists from their so-called liberal organizations. The National Committee To Win the Peace will be discussed later in this report.

Since this report has mentioned the Southern Conference for Human Welfare it seems appropriate that some evidence concerning the communistic character of the organization be set forth in this report. To begin with, Earl Browder, former head of the Communist Party in the United States has testified publicly that the Southern Conference for Human Welfare is a transmission belt for communistic propaganda. This statement by a Communist puppet should in itself alone prove to even the gullible that the Southern Conference for Human Welfare is being used by the Communists to further their cause and not the cause of those who are ostensibly the recipients of the alleged social work performed by the organization.

However, there is a great deal more evidence concerning the communistic character of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. For instance, one of the theoretical Communist Party organs called the Communist in January 1939, carried an article by Robert Fowler Hall which referred to a speech by Earl Browder. Hall in 1939 was secretary of the Communist Party of Alabama. In discussing the Browder speech Hall said in the article which appeared in the Communist:

"Comrade Browder's remark thus anticipated the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, held in Birmingham, November 2–23. Let us estimate the southern conference in the light of Comrade Browder's remarks at the tenth convention of the Communist Party. In this sense, we can say that the southern conference was a brilliant cofirmation of the line of the Democratic front advanced by Comrade Browder at the tenth convention. Our comrades naturally watched the conference preparations closely and helped wherever possible. Southern State organizations of the Communist Party were represented at the conference by five southern Communist delegates. In strengthening this movement, our party has before it a great task. On this basis, our party can and must proceed to recruit from the progressive ranks many hundreds of members."

This article therefore states in effect that the Southern Conference for Human Welfare was formed through a directive issued in a speech by Earl Browder and that the Communists were not only active openly in the first conference of the organization, but were also behind the scenes during the preparations for the conference. Also this article, plainly interpreted, states that the Southern Conference for Human Welfare is to be used as a recruiting base by the Communist Party. Plainly, therefore, the Southern Conference for Human Welfare is another Karl Marx study club such as we have described hereinbefore.

James W. Ford, a Communist candidate for public office in the years just passed, said in speaking of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and the Southern Negro Youth Conference:

"The Communists, through their pioneering work in the South, may justly claim to have laid the foundation for those great social movements."

This article appeared in the Communist magazine in September 1938. Further proof of the communistic purpose of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare is again demonstrated.

Further evidence of the communistic character of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare is available to the committee, but in the interest of brevity only the foregoing has been presented.

Clark Foreman, in addition to his association with the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., is also active in the affairs of the National Committee To Win the Peace. The National Committee To Win the Peace is opposed to the foreign policy of the United States Government, particularly on the question of Yugoslavia and China. For instance, the Communist publication called the Daily Worker carried a release issued by the National Committee To Win the Peace on August 23, 1946, which stated, "The unwarranted United States ultimatum to Yugoslavia and the ostentatious display of military power in the Mediterranean have put the security of our Nation and the peace of the world in peril." The statement further says "The balance of good will accumulated by the United States during World War II is rapidly being dissipated by the brash acts of our diplomats and military leaders who are talking through their guns." In other words, the National Committee To Win the Peace oppose the United States even when the American State Department finds it necessary to issue an ultimatum to a government that has openly been hostile to the United States, and a government which sanctioned the murder of innocent American fliers. It will be recalled that Marshal Tito, the Moscow puppet in Yugoslavia, ordered the Yugoslav Air Force to shoot down all planes flying over the territory of Yugoslavia which have the insignia of the British and American Air Forces. In following out this order the Yugoslav Air Force shot down an unarmed American transport plane, which resulted in the death of five innocent American soldiers.

Despite the fact that the incident appalled most of us in the United States, the National Committee To Win the Peace placed the entire blame for the incident upon the actions of our diplomatic and military leaders. No blame for the murder of the American soldiers was assessed to Tito by the National Committee To Win the Peace.

The National Committee To Win the Peace has been set up as a front organization by the Communists in order to secure sympathy for Russia's foreign policy in Europe, and for the Russian satellite nations. Many of the persons associated with the National Committee To Win the Peace are also associated with another organization called the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. This latter organization has been set up by the Communists for the purpose of securing sympathy for Russia's foreign policy on far-eastern matters. The Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy has a total of 143 directors, consultants, and sponsors. Of these 112 have extensive records of association with Communist-front groups. Some of the persons making up the list of sponsors are known members of the Communist Party. The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is represented in this group through Selden Menefee who has been mentioned previously in this report.

In the interest of brevity all of the associations of stockholder Clark Foreman are not being incorporated herein, but it is believed that the data concerning Foreman which has been included herein is sufficient to show that he has contributed to organizations which have definitely shown that they are communistic in character and in action, and that some of them were actually created by the Communist Party of the United States in order to achieve the realization of certain phases of the Communist Party line.

Stockholder Mary Jane Keeney

Another stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is Mary Jane Keeney. In a publication called Black and White, volume 1, No. 4, September 1939, there is a story entitled "The Making of a Radical," which was written by Mary Jane Keeney. In the article the author plainly speaks of her conversion to the philosophy of Karl Marx.

There remains very little doubt as to the real purpose of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. For here is a stockholder who has openly expressed her devotion to the philosophy of communism. The purpose of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is to issue communistic propaganda over the American air waves.

It should also be stated that some years ago the husband of Mary Jane Keeney was discharged from a position as a professor in a university because he propounded communistic theory.

Stockholder Robert Sherman

Another stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is one Robert Sherman. He has been a member of five Communist-front organizations. Three of these organizations have been cited as Communist fronts by the United States Department of Justice.

Stockholder Martin Robert Rogers

Another stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is Martin Robert Rogers. This individual is reported to have associated with known Communists in the literary field, and to have furnished several known Communists with employment while he was editor of a magazine called Click, Inc., in order that they could have means of subsistence while they were engaged in Communist Party work.

Stockholder Owen Lattimore

The above-named individual is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. Owen Lattimore has been affiliated with the Writers' Congress of the Hollywood Writers' Mobilization. This organization is a successor of the Pacific coast branch of the League of American Writers, which has been cited as subversive by former Attorney General Biddle. Also it should be stated that the first Congress of the League of American Writers was described in International Literature, a magazine published in Moscow, Russia, as the first congress of revolutionary writers in a capitalist country.

Owen Lattimore has also been associated with the Amerasia magazine. The managing editor of this magazine, Philip J. Jaffe, was recently convicted of a violation of the security laws of the United States relating to the possession of documents stolen from secret Government files. The documents in question were stolen by various Government employees and made available to Jaffe, who subsequently, it is alleged, made them available to the American Communist party. The disposition and handling of the case involving Jaffe by various governmental agencies is the subject of an investigation being conducted by another congressional committee. It is alleged as the basis of the investigation that Jaffe and others involved with him were recipients of special favors by certain governmental agencies. Nevertheless, here we find a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. who has been associated with a convicted espionage agent in the publication of a Communist party line magazine.

Also, it might be stated here that Philip J. Jaffe is a consultant for the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. Kate L. Mitchell, who was implicated with Jaffe in the espionage case, but who was not convicted, however, is also a consultant for the same organization. Selden Menefee, who is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., who has been mentioned before in this report, is also a sponsor of the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

This report has pointed out the danger of association between Communists and Government employees because of the opportunities that such association provides for the recruiting of espionage agents. We must, therefore, consider that the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. has now fallen into the category of a Karl Marx Study Club from which espionage and propaganda agents are recruited. The association of stockholders Menefee and Lattimore with Philip J. Jaffe, a convicted espionage agent, should definitely demonstrate the point. As further evidence of the association of these individuals and the purpose of their association, we need only to point out that the documents involved in the Jaffe espionage case concerned in part the activities of the Chiang Kai-shek government in China. The Amerasia magazine, of which Jaffe is editor, specializes in far-eastern affairs and has been very critical of the Chiang Kai-shek government. Being a Communist Party line publication, the magazine is critical of Chiang Kai-shek and supports the Chinese Communists. One of the documents stolen and turned over to Jaffe contained detailed information concerning the disposition of the troops under Chiang Kai-shek's command, which, of course, is a very valuable document for the Communists to acquire, since Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Communists are now engaged in a civil war. Another document involved was one which described in some detail the entire personal and political background of the Chiang Kai-shek family. This document, of course, was very valuable for the purpose of circulating anti-Chiang Kai-shek propaganda. Some of the other documents involved military secrets of great value, but since they bear no relation to the matter under consideration they will not be discussed here. These documents were found in the possession of Philip Jaffe at the offices of the Amerasia magazine at the time of his arrest by the Federal authorities. Some of these documents apparently were used as the basis of articles condemning the Chiang Kai-shek government and the American State Department's support of Chiang which appeared in Amerasia from time to time.

Owen J. Lattimore, like Philip J. Jaffe and Kate L. Mitchell, has supported organizations which want to see a communistic government in China.

Selden Menefee, who like Owen J. Lattimore, is a stockholder in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., is now associated with Philip J. Jaffe and Kate L. Mitchell in the functions of the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, which organization stands for support of the Soviet Russian policy in the Far East and the communization of China.

It must be recalled that Government employees were used by Philip J. Jaffe to secure confidential documents. The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. has numerous Government employees associated with it, some of whom hold strategic positions. The possibility of their use as espionage agents by such as Jaffe is a grim reality.

Stockholder Russell M. Shepherd

Another individual who is associated with the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is Russel M. Shepherd, who functions as director of the Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service of the United States War Department. This agency at one time operated under the jurisdiction of the Federal Communications Commission.

Briefly stated, the Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service performs the function of receiving and translating radio broadcasts which emanate from foreign sources. While under the jurisdiction of the Federal Communications Commission, the Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service was the subject of much adverse discussion and publicity. Goodwin Watson, who was at one time an administrative officer of this section of the Federal Communications Commission, was ordered discharged from the Federal payroll after a prolonged investigation by a congressional subcommittee which found that Watson was subversive. Goodwin Watson is now associated with the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

As this report has stated, Selden Menefee, of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., is also a member of this Communist front.

Russell M. Shepherd, director of the Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service, has through his association in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. again brought the Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service into disrepute.

General statements regarding the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

1. The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. was granted licenses by the Federal Communications Commission without any effort being made by the Commission to determine the extent of communistic influence in the corporation.

2. The wife of a Commissioner of the Federal Communications Commission is vice president of a Communist-front organization of which one of the officers of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is president.

3. The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. is an outlet for third-party and communistic propaganda.

4. Two stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp. have been associated with a convicted espionage subject.

5. Known Communists are stockholders in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., as well as contributors to the Communist Party.

6. Numerous Communist-front organizations are represented through the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

7. Numerous Government employees who in some instances hold responsible positions have placed not only themselves in jeopardy but the Government they represent as well, through their association in the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp.

8. A former employee of the Federal Communications Commission is general manager of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., and he has told other persons that he engineered the granting of the licenses by the Commission.

9. Through the interlocking directorates of organizations represented among the stockholders of the Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., it is definitely indicated that the third-party movement is Communist-inspired and Communist-dominated.

10. The Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., because it is a Karl Marx study club, has presented possibilities that its members through the strategic positions they occupy in the Federal Government will become sources of information for foreign agents.

P. Bernard Nortman

The files of the State Department contained the following information concerning Mr. Nortman:

1. Memorandum to Mr. Peurifoy, through Mr. Robinson, from Mr. Fitch, dated June 16, 1947.

Reference is made to the case of P. Bernard Nortman, who was transferred to the Department from FFA and who is employed as an economist, P-6, in the Division of Investment and Economic Development. The subject has been investigated in connection with Federal employments by the Civil Service Commission, the War Department, and CSA, and all of these investigations with the exception of CSA's were entirely favorable to subject.

It is known that Nortman has been under surveillance by the FBI and that he has been interrogated in his home by agents of that agency. According to the FBI reports furnished to this Department this surveillance has determined that the subject has been in association with Victor Perlo, William Walter Remington, Mary Jane Keeney, and ———, all of whom are subjects in a current investigation of Soviet espionage activities in agencies of this Government. It was also learned during an interview with subject by CSA that he rides in a car pool with V. Frank Coe, who is another subject in the aforementioned investigation.

Specifically, the FBI has reported that Nortman was in contact with Perlo on December 1, 1945, and on September 3, 1946; that he was in contact with Remington on August 19, 1946; that he was in contact with Mrs. Keeney on August 19, 1946, and again on August 22, 1946; and that he was in contact with ——— on March —, 1946.

It is further stated in a recent FBI report that Mrs. Nortman talked on the telephone with Mrs. Keeney on May 27, 1947, and that she asked when Mrs. Keeney was coming to visit them. When interviewed, the subject explained that he had met Perlo and Mrs. Keeney through previous employment and that he had gone to Dr. Weinstein's office for dental work because the latter had a special technique for treating teeth, which Nortman felt would be helpful. He admitted that he was acquainted through his employment with H. Bowen Smith who is another subject in the current FBI investigation of Soviet espionage activities in agencies of the Federal Government.

It is noteworthy that the subject did not mention his association with Remington, a name not mentioned by FBI agents, during their interrogation of him, until asked specifically if he knew Remington. In discussing his relationship with Remington, Nortman stated that he had met him at Columbia University and that he had seen him from time to time since his arrival in Washington, D. C., in 1942. However, subject added that he had not seen Remington since he had been in the Department. This statement may be false as FBI surveillance has revealed that on August 19, 1946, Nortman was in contact with Remington at which time he discussed his job in the Department.

Confidential informant ——— has alleged that around 1936 both he and the subject were members of unit 1 of the Harlem section of the Communist Party. The informant also alleged that he frequently saw the subject at meetings of the unit; that subject was very active in the unit; and that he may well have been a Communist Party functionary. ——— further charged that subject became associated with another unit of the Communist Party when unit 1 was split in 1937. An attempt was made by CSA to corroborate the above statement through inquiry with confidential and undercover sources in New York, N. Y., but no corroborating evidence could be obtained from the sources contacted. However, it does not appear that any of the informants contacted were members of the unit of the Communist Party of which the subject allegedly was a member.

A confidential informant has advised the FBI that Beatrice Smith, a known former member of the Communist Party in the District of Columbia, had in her possession at one time a list of persons all of whom were believed to be Federal employees. An inquiry was being made about the individuals on this list to determine if they were members of the Communist Party or were desirous of becoming members of the party. Several notations relating to P. Bernard Nortman and his wife were contained on the list.

The CSA investigation disclosed that Nortman has been friendly since his student days at Columbia University with one Moses I. Finkelstein and the subject stated during his interview that he sees Finkelstein when he is in New York, N. Y. Two informants interviewed indicated that the subject had been quite friendly with Finkelstein during 1938 to the 1940 period. The FBI in New York, N. Y., described Finkelstein as a party-liner and a Communist sympathizer, and he has also been reported as being on the speakers' list of the American Peace Mobilization; as being a secretary of the American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom, cited as a Communist-front organization by the Special House Committee on Un-American Activities, and as being the membership chairman of the American-Russian Institute, which has been described as a Communist-front organization by the afore-mentioned House committee. Finkelstein was also charged with being a Communist before the Rapp-Coudert committee by William Canning, but he denied the allegation. It is also significant that Sidney Hook, New York University, stated that in his opinion Finkelstein is a member of the Communist Party, and he further indicated that he would view with suspicion the association of any departmental employee with Finkelstein.

Many individuals were interviewed during the CSA investigation of P. Bernard Nortman, and the majority of them commented favorably with regard to his loyalty to the United States. One informant who worked with the subject in the WPB stated that Nortman had made remarks that he interpreted as pro-Russian. The informant indicated that Nortman regarded the Russian-German nonaggression pact as one of the most brilliant strokes of modern diplomacy and that he belittled the achievements of the United States Army during the war, but at the same time praised in a lavish manner everything concerning the Soviet Government and the Red army. Another informant, who also worked with Nortman at the WPB, stated that he had heard remarks to the effect that Nortman was a Trotskyite. However, the informant could furnish no additional information in this regard.

It may also be of interest that during one of the hearings given to the subject he discussed the Marzani case and indicated that the sentence which might be given was too harsh when compared to the sentence given to one Romney, who was accused of embezzling funds of the House of Representatives. Nortman also seemed to place considerable weight, on the testimony offered on Marzani's behalf by Emile Despres and it appears that he regarded this testimony as more significant than that offered by the Government in the case.

The subject at times during the various hearings was rather vague in his answers and was not able to recall various groups and organizations whose meetings he might have attended. In view of the allegation that he had been a member of the Communist Party in New York, N. Y., he was particularly questioned regarding his activities during his study and employment at Columbia University. He indicated that he had attended meetings of various groups and had participated in study groups, but the only study group about which he could recall any information was one headed by a person named Lerner, who Nortman described as a dissident Communist.

The investigation did not disclose that the subject has committed any overt acts on behalf of the Communist Party or Communist-front organizations. It should also be pointed out that an evaluation by CSA of some of the writings submitted by the subject has disclosed no Communist slant in them. However, it is believed that the cumulative weight of Nortman's admitted association with subject's in the Gregory case and with Finkelstein, of his alleged membership in the Communist Party, and of the above comments from a coworker at the WPB, is such, that a reasonable doubt as to his loyalty is raised. In view of this it is felt that the subject's continued employment in an agency as sensitive as the Department of State constitutes a security risk and it is recommended that his services be terminated.

2. Communication from the Philadelphia division of the security agency of the State Department addressed to the Chief Special Agent in Washington, D. C., dated June 9, 1947.

Personal attention was given this case at Philadelphia, Pa., on June 9, 1947.

As requested in your letter of June 5, 1947, I interviewed Prof. Simon Kuznets at the Wharton School, University of Pennsylvania. Professor Kuznets is professor of statistics here.

Professor Kuznets states that the subject, P. Bernard Nortman, worked under his general supervision in the Planning Division of the WPB at Washington, D. C., from the early part of 1943 until about May 1944. He was also Associate Director of the Planning and Statistical Division.

Professor Kuznets states that prior to his employment by WPB, Nortman was employed in the Material Division of the Air Corps at Washington, D. C., under Gen. Bennett Myers and that a man by the name of Silverman was his superior there. Professor Kuznets was not certain that this employment was with the War Department, but knows that the particular division in which Nortman worked supplied material for Wright Field.

3. Communication from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI to Frederick B. Lyon, Director of the Office of Controls, classified personal and confidential and delivered by special messenger. The letter was dated August 2, 1946.

In compliance with your request there follows a summary of information appearing in the files of this Bureau concerning P. Bernard Nortman, an employee of the State Department.

One P. Bernard Nortman attended the City College, New York City, during the period 1930 to 1935 and was on the editorial staff of the college paper known as the Campus.

According to an anonymous letter sent to the special committee investigating Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, dated January 29, 1946, which complained about aliens being retained on the rolls of the State Department while native-born citizens were being discharged, one of the individuals mentioned by the complainant was the case of Frederick M. Mossner of FEA, who was described as a German alien and generally thought to be disloyal. One of his sponsors was mentioned as P. Bernard Nortman, who was instrumental in having his termination notice recalled.

P. Bernard Nortman was the subject of a special inquiry conducted by this Bureau for the State Department in 1946. Copies of investigative reports have been made available to the State Department. It is noted that during this investigation it was determined that Nortman on December 1, 1945, visited Victor Perlo one of the subjects in the Gregory case presently being investigated by this Bureau and about which you have been supplied full information.

In connection with the above visit, a man, woman, and a 3-year-old child, in a 1934 Buick automobile bearing Virginia license tags 112-079 registered in the name of P. Bernard Nortman, 411 Brook Drive, Falls Church, Va., were observed to arrive at the residence of Victor Perlo at approximately 4 p. m., December 1, 1945. These individuals departed at 6:10 p. m.

Investigation in the Gregory case, has developed that Dr. Abraham B. Weinstein, a dentist in New York City, who is a highly suspected espionage agent and a contact of a number of the subjects in the Gregory case, according to reliable sources, has been contacted by P. Bernard Nortman an employee of the Economic Security Control Office of the State Department. Nortman is known to have been in the office of ——— on ———.

In the event further information is developed that Nortman is in contact with any known or suspected Communists or Soviet espionage agents you will immediately be advised.

4. Communication from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI to Frederick B. Lyon, Director of the Office of Controls, classified personal and confidential and delivered by special messenger. The letter was dated August 23, 1946.

Reference is made to my communication to you dated August 2, 1946, which sets out information contained in the files of this Bureau concerning P. Bernard Nortman.

I thought you would be interested in the following pertinent information which has come to the attention of this Bureau since that time.

Through a source regarded as reliable it was learned that on August 20, 1946, William Walter Remington, who you may recall is a subject in the Gregory case and who is an employee of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, was in contact with P. Bernard Nortman at which time Nortman advised that he was now employed in a new position at the State Department, which he described as a very nice job in the Economic Development Section of the State Department. He further advised that in connection with his job he works on loans to foreign countries. It was indicated that Nortman's telephone extension at the State Department is 3839.

5. Communication from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI to Frederick B. Lyon, Director of the Office of Controls, classified personal and confidential and delivered by special messenger. The letter was dated January 30, 1947.

Pursuant to your request, the following supplemental data concerning P. Bernard Nortman, an employee of the State Department, is being made available to you.

You may recall that in previous correspondence you were advised that Nortman and his wife were known to have contacted Victor Perlo, another subject in the Gregory case, on December 1, 1945, and that Nortman is known to have visited the offices of ——— in New York City, prominently mentioned in the Gregory case, on March —, 1946.

On August 19, 1946, Nortman was in contact with William W. Remington, another Gregory case subject and Nortman indicated to Remington that he was then employed in the Economic Security Policy Section, Financial Development Division of the State Department and his position entailed working on loans to foreign countries. Nortman said that his boss was in London working with Lubin, who is attached to a subcommittee of the United Nations Conference. Remington desired to know if Nortman would be interested in accepting a teaching job at a salary of $3,500 for two terms. Nortman declined, stating that due to his financial status he would be unable to accept such an appointment.

On the same date Mary Jane Keeney, former State Department employee and one who is prominently mentioned in the Gregory case, contacted Nortman and inquired as to the whereabouts of H. Bown Smith, a former State Department employee. Keeney and Nortman agreed to meet at a later date. On August 22, 1946, a physical surveillance revealed that Mary Jane Keeney had lunch with Nortman on that date.

On August 28, 1946, a physical surveillance reflected that Nortman had lunch with Alexander Gerschenkron, an employee of the State Department serving on the U. S. S. R. Country Committee. Gereschenkron has been reported to have soft pedaled all problems in which the Soviet Union was involved on the grounds that any strong action would estrange the Soviet Union.

On September 3, 1946, a physical surveillance revealed that Nortman contacted Victor Perlo, previously mentioned, in the latter's office and spent approximately 1½ hours with Perlo. Nortman was observed carrying a legal-sized folder when he entered Perlo's office and when he left the office he was not carrying this folder. After his departure Nortman returned to his office in the State Department.

You will be advised of any further pertinent contacts made by Nortman in connection with his current activities.

7. Unsigned memorandum from the FBI dated July 11, 1947.

On May 19 and 20, 1947, no contacts of a significant nature were observed to be made by Mr. Nortman.

On May 21, 1947, at 1:05 p. m., Nortman was observed leaving the State Department building with an unknown man and they walked back and forth on Seventeenth Street, NW., between New York Avenue and Pennsylvania Avenue for approximately 25 minutes, engaging in continuous conversation. At 1:30 p. m., Nortman returned to his office and the unknown individual entered the State Department building at Twenty-third and E Streets NW., and was observed to enter room 707. It was observed that this room was occupied by the Central European Section, and it is believed that the individual contacted by Nortman was Mr. Arthur Leon Horniker, who occupies a desk in this room.

On May 22 and 23, 1947, no contacts of significance were made by Nortman. The only contacts that he made were with individuals residing in his neighborhood with whom he associated in a car pool.

A highly confidential and reliable source advised that on May 27, 1947, Dorothy Nortman, wife of P. Bernard Nortman, was in contact with Mary Jane Keeney, a former employee of the State Department and a strongly suspected Communist. Mrs. Keeney stated that she had thought about Mrs. Nortman a great deal and had received a message from Mr. Nortman in a roundabout way and therefore did not want to contact Mrs. Nortman. Mrs. Keeney said that her husband had arrived from Japan and that things were "in a state." Mrs. Nortman stated that they had been having their time too. She regarded this remark as "part of the same thing." Mrs. Nortman inquired as to when Mrs. Keeney would come to visit her. Mrs. Keeney inquired if it would be all right for her and her husband to visit the Nortmans. Mrs. Nortman said: "I have decided the devil with them—I mean they are not going to stop us from living." Mrs. Keeney inquired as to whether the thing had been settled. Mrs. Nortman said that it had not been settled and that they don't know what is going to happen, but "they know we know you (Mrs. Keeney) so what is the point in pretending in some way that we don't know." She stated that apparently they are just as objectionable as Mrs. Keeney. Mrs. Keeney said that as a matter of fact anyone that had certain beliefs in the United States was just as objectionable. Mrs. Nortman agreed and said that she didn't believe in turning around and running in the opposite direction "just because they opened their mouths." She stated: "I mean the devil with them, let them do their darndest." Mrs. Keeney admired her "spunk." It was finally decided that Mrs. Keeney should continue to contact the Nortman's and come and visit them.

11. Memorandum to Counsel ACOPS from Hamilton Robinson dated April 1, 1947.

This memorandum enumerates the activities of P. Bernard Nortman. The closing paragraph is as follows:

"In the opinion of the Office of Controls the information contained in the preceding paragraphs raises a reasonable doubt as to the loyalty of the subject to the Government of the United States and as to his security reliability and accordingly it is recommended that his services be terminated."

SECRET PLANS LAID FOR DRIVE TO ATTACK THOMAS COMMITTEE—GROUP OF 1,000, HEADED BY DR. SHAPLEY, AIMS TO PERSUADE CONGRESS TO ABOLISH INQUIRY—HOLLYWOOD STARS HAVE BIG ROLE

Secret plans have been completed for the formation of a new organization designed to attack the Thomas Committee on Un-American Activities with a Nation-wide high-pressure campaign, it was learned today. Emphasis will be put on persuading Congress to abolish the committee, the plans reveal.

Headed by Dr. Harlow Shapley, Harvard astronomer, the organization is known as the Committee of One Thousand. Its first publicity blast was carried in a full-page newspaper advertisement over the signatures of 20 prominent persons. The committee hopes to avoid the stigma of Communist domination by having some of the original sponsors withdraw into the background after the campaign gets under way next week.

The impetus for the committee came at a meeting in New York in October 1947, of the arts, sciences and professions section of the Progressive Citizens of America. The initial plans were made at a hotel-room conference by Shapley, Hannah Dorner, past executive secretary of the P. C. A.; J. Raymond Walsh, and Howard Mumford Jones, dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, it was learned. At this meeting a list of 1,000 prominent persons was prepared to reactivate the original Committee of One Thousand, formed in 1943 to appeal to the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt for special consideration to the Soviet Union in the writing of the peace treaties.

HEADQUARTERS NOW IN CAPITAL

After this meeting Shapley and Miss Dorner set up headquarters of the committee in a New York hotel room but later it was decided to move the headquarters to Washington, where it is now at 1710 G Street NW.

After its move to Washington the committee's first blast was the full-page newspaper advertisement which called for donations. The advertisement said nothing about a special meeting planned in Washington next Monday to which a number of Congressmen have been invited.

Among those who signed the advertisement were Shapley, Bowen Smith, executive secretary, and William Rose Benet, Henry Seidel Canby, Norman Corwin, Albert Einstin, Olin Downes, Fredric March, Florence Eldridge (Mrs. Fredric March), Marshall Field, Archibald MacLeish, Rexford G. Tugwell, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Dorothy Canfield Fisher and Christian Gauss, all listed as original sponsors.

The meeting in Washington on Monday is supposed to be a spontaneous one. Efforts have been made to persuade one newspaper to write an editorial favorable to the aims of the group and a nationally known columnist is being propositioned to write a column on the Committee of One Thousand before the meeting. At the meeting pressure will be exerted on any Congressman present for passage of the Sabath resolution calling for the dissolution of the Thomas committee. Pressure also will be put on Senator JAMES MURRAY (Democrat, Montana) to introduce a similar resolution in the Senate.

CONGRESS MEMBERS INVOLVED

Bowen Smith, the group's executive secretary, this week was told by Representative SABATH to "line up" with Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS (Democrat, California), Senator CLAUDE PEPPER (Democrat, Florida), and Senator GLEN TAYLOR (Democrat, Idaho), representatives of the far-left wing of the Democratic Party. TAYLOR has been mentioned as a possible running mate for Henry Wallace on the third party ticket. At a conference between Shapley and Miss Dorner on January 13 it was decided that Senator WAYNE MORSE (Republican, Oregon), and PEPPER would be asked to introduce bills for the dissolution of the Thomas committee.

It was learned that leaders of the new group held lengthy discussions over the desirability of certain individuals as members of the organization. At one point in a discussion over Tugwell, one of the eventual sponsors, it was stated that Tugwell wanted to be national chairman of the group and therefore was anathema to Shapley.

Robert Kenny, former attorney general of California and attorney for some of the film writers who refused to answer questions on their Communist affiliations, was consulted by Shapley. Hollywood is scheduled to play an important part in the committee's work. Persons sympathetic with the group's aims are sponsoring a stage show Monday to coincide with the committee's meeting in Washington. Asked to participate are such stars as Lucille Ball, Charles Boyer, Fredric March and his wife, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., Katharine Hepburn, Gregory Peck, Frank Sinatra, Sylvia Sidney, and Cornel Wilde. Groucho Marx's name was stricken from the list, it was learned, when the sponsors decided that the public looked upon him as only a screwball comedian and that the whole committee might be characterized as such because of this.

Other Hollywood figures asked to participate in Monday's show include Edward G. Robinson, Myrna Loy, Eddie Cantor, Deanna Durbin, Franchot Tone, Robert Young, George Sessions, Milton Sterling, Pandro S. Berman, Ben Hecht, and William Wyler.

Two weeks ago after a meeting in New York, a telegram was sent to a number of prominent persons from the Century Club in New York. It was signed by Shapley and asked these public figures to join the Committee of One Thousand in conducting "a dignified educational and legislative campaign calling on all Americans who likewise would safeguard our traditional freedoms to join with us" in eliminating the Thomas committee. Among those to whom the telegram was sent were Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Nelson Rockefeller, Thomas H. Benton, Pearl Buck, Walter Lippmann, Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, Franklin P. Adams, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, E. B. White, Henry Kaiser, Einstein, James L. Fly, Carl Van Doren, Eugene Ormandy, Norman Cousins, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Sinclair Lewis, John Hersey, Sergi Koussevitzky, Arturo Toscanini, Quentin Reynolds, Walter White, Maxwell Anderson, Deems Taylor, Rex Stout, A. F. Whitney, Samuel Seabury, Chester Bowles, Robert Sherwood, Samuel Rosenman, Mark Ethridge, John W. Davis, Philip Murray, and C. C. Burlingham. Also stricken from the list was Dr. Harry Woodburn Chase, chancellor of New York University, because he suspended Prof. Lyman Bradley from the university faculty because of his association with a Red front group.

At a conference between Shapley and Miss Dorner last week it was disclosed that four persons had refused the invitation already. These were Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, former Governor Lehman, Walter Lippmann, and Sergei Koussevitzky.

Facts, Not Fancy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER E. BREHM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, I call upon you, also my colleagues in the Congress, as well as any competent attorney in the country to bear witness to the following.

A voluntary campaign contribution has no connection with "kick-backs" or "payroll padding." Also, no money is paid to any Member of Congress for clerk hire. All of our office help is paid directly by check from the disbursing office. Any money left after taxes is theirs to spend as they choose and it is no one's business but their own.

Over a 3-year period covering two congressional elections, a voluntary contribution of $600 was made to my campaign fund. I listed this money under oath with the Secretary of State as well as with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and I challenge anyone to submit reliable or documentary evidence to prove otherwise.

My opposition is trying in every way possible to convince my people that this is illegal. If it were, then half the people in the United States would be in jail either for giving or receiving a campaign contribution.

I am 58 years old. Only twice in that time has my integrity ever been questioned. Once in the 1944 campaign and now in the 1950 campaign. Both times I faced the same unscrupulous opposition.

The radical left-wing element of the CIO-PAC is spending and contributing thousands of dollars in an effort to gain control of Congress. However, I feel certain that my people are too smart to fall for their lying propaganda. I just wanted you to know the length to which they are going in an effort to take me out of Congress. How much further they will go before election is anyone's guess.

Address of Hon. Joseph R. McCarthy, of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered to the Wisconsin Retail Food Dealers Association, Milwaukee, Wis., August 6, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

At this very moment, ladies and gentlemen, American men are dying in Korea. There is a question of vast importance to those left behind by not only those who die today, but also those who die tomorrow and next year and the year after that. The question is whether those young men are dying because of the incompetence or traitorous acts of those who have been entrusted with power in this Nation or whether they are dying because of the ambitions of the Communist rulers to enslave the world—or because of a combination of the two.

It is no secret that I have repeatedly stated that those young men are dying because of two things: (1) the decision made in the Kremlin that the world must be subjugated to atheistic communism, and (2) because there are today in controlling positions in our Government those who are more loyal to communism than to western civilization.

As you know, my charges in this respect resulted in the appointment of a senatorial committee which was ordered and empowered to make a complete investigation of Communistic infiltration of our State Department. That committee has now announced to the world that its task is completed and that all of those suspected are actually simon pure, loyal Americans. For example, the chairman of that committee, Senator TYDINGS has said, "There is not a single Communist in the State Department and there is no evidence against those charged that they are Communist, pro-Communist or in any way disloyal."

If this is true, then this Nation is in no danger of enslavement for as a great historian once said, if this Nation falls, it will not fall because of enemies from without but rather because of enemies from within. If the report of TYDINGS and MCMAHON is true, then those young men dying in Korea are dying for a really worth-while reason.

If, however, as I have stated, TYDINGS and MCMAHON, who control the committee and who were hand-picked for the job by Senator LUCAS, are two little men—little mentally and little morally—men who could not rise to the occasion and do a great service to this Nation—if, as I have maintained, they have done a dishonest job and were interested in protecting Communists for political reasons, then this Nation is in grave danger and the blood of those young men who are today dying in the hills and valleys of Korea stains not only the hands of the masters of the Kremlin but stains also the hands of those men in this Nation who cannot rise above politics—who cannot rise to the challenge of the problems of 1950. Yes, staining—if you please—the hands of those who place cheap political considerations before the welfare not only of this Nation but of civilization as a whole.

Now there is no secret about the fact that I have claimed that this committee was controlled by little men—that it was completely ridden with politics—and that the results of its activities would long remain as a blot upon the honor of the Senate and a disgrace to America.

I realize that those of you who agree with me may think it is a vast waste of time to delve into the activities of that committee. However, I am sure you will agree that if I am right and if the results of that committee's work are allowed to stand, that then a tremendous force for evil has been created.

If, on the other hand, I am wrong and the committee is right, then certainly McCarthy should be stilled.

Therefore, I strongly feel that the work of that committee should be discussed the length and breadth of this land, because it is still not too late to undo the damage which that committee has done this Nation.

Now I realize that it is easy for anyone to make general statements. It is easy for anyone to wave the flag. A vast number of politicians are doing that. Therefore, let's get down to some specific facts. Let's take a few specific cases.

Now as you know, that committee has issued a report pointing out that there is absolutely nothing to the McCarthy charges and that he has "irresponsibly" charged "innocent" people.

As you know, while evidence on 81 cases was given the committee, the names of all except nine were given in private. The committee insisted those nine be given in public. Therefore, the talk of smearing innocent people is necessarily in connection with the nine who were named.

With your permission I would like to give you a very brief résumé of the uncontradicted evidence covering those nine and let you decide whether or not their activities and their background should have been subjected to the spotlight of exposure or should have remained hidden in darkness and secrecy.

First let's take the case of Gustavo Duran. I presented to the committee the complete Army intelligence report showing that he was active in secret Communist operations in Europe and that he was regional head of SIM, a counterpart of the Russian secret police—at first there was the cry of mistaken identity. The State Department said, "Oh, but that is not our Gustavo Duran." I thereupon produced pictures of him in the uniform he wore at the time he was with the secret police and pointed out that that Duran was truly the State Department's own Gustavo, who, incidentally, had been quietly shifted to a higher salaried job in the United Nations. He is another one of the "innocent" people exposed.

Another is Dr. Frederick Schuman, whose job was to lecture and train State Department employees who were to be placed in Communist trouble spots.

He was associated with a vast number of organizations officially listed as fronts for and doing the foul work for the Communist Party. For example, he was a member of the American Council on Soviet Relations, the American Russian Institute, the Civil Rights Congress, the Friends of the Soviet Union, and on and on. He also headed up a campaign committee for Wallace for President.

Do you want this man on your payroll coaching State Department employees who are about to leave for Communist trouble spots?

Another is Haldore Hanson. He was named in testimony under oath by Louis Budenz as a member of the Communist Party. He wrote for Amerasia, a magazine owned by Jaffe, who was also named under oath as a Russian espionage agent and listed by the FBI as a Communist. He was coeditor of a Communist paper in Peiping, China. Hanson wrote a book praising the Communists in China. In this book he admitted that he was arrested with the leaders of the Communist Youth Corps in China. He had this to say of the top Communists in China: "They impressed me as a group or hardheaded, straight-shooting realists."

I hope some of you will get that book and read it. The name of it is Humane Endeavor. Read it and see if you would pick him for a top State Department job.

He is now head of the Technical Project Staff of the Government's point 4 program and is planning the future spending of hundreds of millions of your dollars in various parts of the world.

Here is a man who worked for the Communist editor of a magazine; who praised Communists; who was coeditor of a Communist paper in China; who was named by a Government witness under oath as a member of the Communist Party.

Another is Harlow Shapley. Shapley was chairman of a conference held in New York, March 1949, which President Truman denounced as a tool of Russia and a sounding-board for Communist propaganda. But what does Mr. Acheson do? He rewards Shapley, the chairman of this conference which Truman called a tool of Russia, by giving him an appointment to represent the State Department on a United Nations Commission—paid for, of course largely out of your pockets.

The list of Communist-front organizations to which he belonged is legion.

Then we come to John Stewart Service. Service was arrested by the FBI in connection with the theft of hundreds of secret Government documents. The FBI testified they had microphones in the hotel room of Jaffe, whom they labeled as a Communist when Service visited him. The microphone recording showed that Service discussed military secrets with this Communist while the war was still on. Service admitted having turned over to him classified State Department documents. At the time Service and his five codefendants were arrested, J. Edgar Hoover, according to a Washington paper said, "This is a 100 percent airtight case of espionage." But Service did not go to jail. However, Under Secretary of State Joseph Grew who insisted he be prosecuted, left the Department. Acheson took over and Service was rehired, promoted and put in charge of placing personnel in the Far East area.

The Tydings-McMahon committee said he was a bit indiscreet, but that it was so unfair to expose him.

Another case is that of Judge Kenyon. That case was used as an example of how incompetent was the loyalty board. The State Department loyalty board had the information and the photostats which I had showing that this woman belonged to 28 organizations which were officially labeled as doing the foul work of the Communist Party. Yet the loyalty board never called upon Kenyon to explain.

Also, in a public speech, Kenyon condemned those responsible for exposing Alger Hiss, the Communist traitor and spy.

I am not unmindful of the fact that some of the bleeding hearts shout that this is establishing guilt by association, that the fact that you belong to scores of Communist-front organizations, work with Communists, chum with Communists, travel with Communists means nothing. They forget that people have always been known by the company they keep.

The fact that you gentlemen are members of a retail food dealers' organization should indicate to the normal person that you are interested in food merchandising; if you belong to the Lutheran Young Men's Club, that should normally indicate that you are a Lutheran; if you belong to the Knights of Columbus, it should indicate that you are a Catholic. But the Tydings committee by a tortured process of reasoning concludes that this rule does not even remotely apply for those who belong to Communist-front organizations.

Another case was that of Esther Brunauer, a $10,000-a-year State Department official. She also belonged to a sizable number of organizations named as fronts for the Communist Party. For example, she was chairman of a meeting of the American Friends of the Soviet Union, at which the principal speaker was a well-known Communist and a frequent writer for the official Communist Daily Worker. Brunauer was a signer of the call to the annual meeting of the American Youth Congress which was publicly known to be completely dominated by the Communist Party. She admitted that her husband had Communist connections and had been a member of the Young Communist League.

Here we have a person handling top secret material who not only belonged to Communist-front organizations, but who presided over meetings at which the principal speaker was an extremely well-known Communist and who signs the call for a meeting of a completely Communist dominated and controlled organization and who admits to her husband's former membership in the Young Communist League.

Next we come to Ambassador at Large Philip Jessup. I produced photostatic proof that he was affiliated with not one but five—five organizations which had been officially listed as fronts and doing the work of the Communist Party.

I furnished photostatic proof that he had editorial control of Far Eastern Survey, a publication of an organization officially labeled as a front for the Communist Party. I furnished photostats of checks representing Communist money totaling $6,000 used to support that publication while it was spearheading the Communist Party line. His adviser was Owen Lattimore.

When this was brought to the President's attention, he took action. Ladies and gentlemen, what do you think his action was? It was to give Mr. Jessup top secret clearance to all A- and H-bomb information.

The Tydings committee says "Sure, McCarthy has proved Jessup chums with Communists; sure, McCarthy proved that Jessup's publication was supported by Communist money; sure, McCarthy has proved that Jessup's publication spearheaded the Communist Party line." "But," says the Tydings-McMahon committee, "there is no evidence that Jessup was pro-Communist." "And," says the Tydings-McMahon committee, "McCarthy should not have given American people these facts about the Ambassador at Large Jessup who helped plan American disaster and Soviet victory in the East."

Finally, let's take the case of Owen Lattimore. Lattimore is that State Department adviser who referred to the Communist victory in China as the opening of limitless horizons of hope. Lattimore is the man who was named under oath as a member of the Communist Party and high in the councils of the party—named as a man whose secret symbol, XL, was on the top secret instructions going out from Communist headquarters. Lattimore is the man who admitted using the Soviet diplomatic pouch to get material to Russia.

Lattimore is the man who boasted that the State Department had been successful in allowing China to fall without letting it appear that we pushed her. Lattimore is the man who said, "Let South Korea fall, but don't let it appear that we pushed her."

Lattimore is the man who, upon Acheson's request, furnished advice to the State Department, advice which followed the Communist Party line on Asia almost down to the last period. This advice was held secret until I made it public.

He admits having roamed Asia with Agnes Smedley, who was named by MacArthur's intelligence as a top Soviet spy, and with Philip Jaffe, who was named under oath as a Russian espionage agent and who was found guilty in connection with the theft of hundreds of secret, classified Government documents.

He was publicly proclaimed, according to Wallace's book, by a top Soviet official as "the great hope of China."

Do you want this man planning our foreign policy and on your payroll?

Incidentally, the Tydings-McMahon report says there is no evidence whatsoever that this man Lattimore was in any way pro-Communist and then proceeds to damn McCARTHY from hell to breakfast for having exposed Lattimore. Even though he roamed Asia with Agnes Smedley, Jaffe, and Bison and spent months at Communist headquarters in Yenan where he lectured Mao Tse-tung's Communist troops. Despite all this—the Tydings-McMahon committee says, and let me quote, "There is no evidence that he ever knowingly associated with Communists."

I wonder if they didn't know Mao Tse-tung was a Communist?

I have been trying to coax and club the Tydings-McMahon committee into investigating the second and third echelon in the State Department who have been so carefully placed there over a period of years by the Red dean himself. However, rather than discussing them, let us discuss the evidence on Dean Gooderham Acheson—not evidence that any committee has produced on Acheson; not evidence McCARTHY has produced on Acheson; but evidence that Acheson has produced on Acheson.

So that we will more fully understand the urgent necessity of getting rid of him if this Nation is to survive, let me briefly review what have been the prime objectives of the Communist Party since the days of Lenin. Lenin, who is considered one of the greatest brains of the Communist movement, stated that the two initial major aims of the Soviet should be to create a Red Poland which could be used as a dagger in the heart of Europe and a Red China which was a necessary prelude to a Red Pacific.

As Lenin said: "He who controls China controls the world."

Now let's see what part Acheson played in helping the Communists to obtain these two major objectives.

This is the Acheson who helped to mastermind disaster for America and victory for communism in the east—the same Acheson who in 1939 before Hiss did all of his damage at Yalta said, "Don't investigate Hiss; I will vouch for him completely," and who kept him in top jobs and finally put him at the head of the United Nations Convention in San Francisco.

This is the Acheson who sent Hiss to Yalta where Hiss, together with Gromyko drafted the Yalta agreement. This agreement was described by our American Ambassador to Poland, Arthur Bliss Lane, as follows: "As I glanced over the document, I could not believe my eyes. To me, almost every line spoke of a surrender to Stalin."

This is the Acheson who was sponsored by Senator TYDINGS way back in 1933 for Under Secretary of the Treasury, at which time TYDINGS said, "Don't hold it against him because his law firm has represented Communist interests."

This is the Acheson who said, "I will not turn my back on Alger Hiss," after Hiss was convicted by a jury of perjury in connection with the delivery of State Department secrets to a man named as an espionage agent.

This is the Acheson who, after his clique engineered the Communist victory in China, said, "A new day has dawned in Asia."

This is the Acheson who notified the world that we would not stand in the way of United Nations' recognition of Communist China.

This is the same Acheson who publicly stated that aid to the anti-Communist forces in China was a "silly venture."

From October 1945 to March 1947 Acheson's law firm was retained by the Communist Government of Poland to obtain a $90,000,000 loan from the United States. The loan was put through and Acheson's firm received a fee of over $50,000, according to Acheson's sworn testimony.

During the time Acheson was Assistant Secretary of State. He admitted in January 1949 that he was charged with sole responsibility of making or refusing that loan.

Fifty million of that ninety million went to equip and arm the Communist army and the dreaded UB—the Communist secret police just then being set up in Poland.

It was Mr. Acheson who placed the guns, the whips, the blacksnakes, and the clubs in the hands of those Communists. It was Mr. Acheson who furnished them with bullets to keep a Christian population under Soviet discipline. It was Mr. Acheson who helped put uniforms on the masters of prostrate Poland.

He did not do those things blindly. He was fully advised as to what the money would be used for. Listen to the words of our Ambassador to Poland, Arthur Bliss Lane, who pleaded with Acheson not to make the loan:

"With the greatest earnestness of which I am capable, I beg the Department not to approve the extension of any credits at this time. When the terroristic activities of the Security Police come to an end, when freedom of the press is restored, and when American citizens are released from Polish prisons—not until then should United States public funds be used to assist the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity."

Lane was on the ground. He knew the facts. He had gone about the country and talked with hundreds of real Polish leaders, who were bitterly opposed to an American loan to the Communist government.

He begged Acheson, in behalf of Poland and liberty, not to make a loan to Communist Poland.

But Acheson coldly turned aside Ambassador Lane's warning. Shortly thereafter, Lane resigned to tell his story in his book, under the very significant title, "I Saw Poland Betrayed." Lane went and Acheson remained. Acheson always remains.

You will recall that the Congress last year voted millions of dollars to furnish necessary planes, tanks, antitank guns, rifles, and ammunition so that the South Koreans might be able to defend themselves. We voted one item of $75,000,000, any part of which could be used in Korea. We voted another item of $10,300,000, all of it to be used to arm South Korea. The President signed those two bills without a word of protest. Democrats and Republicans alike, almost unanimously, voted that money. Then what happened? At that point the State Department crowd stepped in and, ladies and gentlemen, how much of that money do you think was actually spent to arm South Korea? The answer is not one ounce of gunpowder, not a single shot ever found its way to Korea. Out of the $10,300,000 which was appropriated for the defense of South Korea only $200 was spent, and that to load some baling wire.

If that congressional plan to arm South Korea—a plan approved by our military—had not been sabotaged by the State Department the blood of American boys would not be staining the hills and valleys of South Korea today.

The Acheson who made the $50,000,000 loan of your money, ladies and gentlemen, to the Communists in Poland is the same Acheson who kept from the anti-Communist forces in Formosa and in Korea the $35,300,000 appropriation which the Congress voted so that they might fight communism.

Why, ladies and gentlemen, why does the American Secretary of State, the man who is supposed to be fighting against communism, why does he insist upon making loans to Communists in one half of the world while he denies money to the anti-Communist forces in the other half of the world?

Now the question that must arise in your mind is, "Why doesn't the Congress do something about this?" "Why does the Congress stand idly by while a group of Communists, fellow travelers, and their dupes sabotage the efforts of the American people to hold back the aetheistic Communist horde before it hits our shores?" It is truly a good question, gentlemen.

The American people want to know where and how was spent the $90,000,000,000 which the American people gave to make this Nation strong. If that money was wasted, then the American people want to know where, how, why, and by whom.

As you know, the Armed Services Committee is charged with the responsibility of making sure that the money which we appropriate for the arming of this Nation (and of any other nation) is being properly spent. Who do you think is the chairman of that committee? None other than MILLARD TYDINGS—the same TYDINGS who headed the whitewash committee. As chairman of that committee he should be the watchdog of the American people. As chairman of the Armed Services Committee Senator TYDINGS should know where the $90,000,000,000 we spent to make this Nation militarily strong went. As chairman of that committee he should know why only $200 was spent to arm South Korea, out of a total of $85,300,000 which was appropriated for that purpose. As chairman of that committee, he should be the powerful, vigilant watchdog of 152,000,000 American people—truly a great job.

Unfortunately, the man whom the administration placed in charge of that committee, instead of being a bristling, vigilant watchdog is the administration's whimpering lap dog. This is truly a tragic situation.

Today, the same columnists who have always headed the smear brigade against those who would expose Communists and traitors at home, have now wrapped themselves in the American flag and are attempting to convince the American people by some strange, twisted reasoning that the best way to aid our fighting men is to protect the traitors who are responsible for sending our soldiers almost bare-handed against tanks in the mud of the valleys of Korea.

Today, those people who are responsible for disaster for America and success for Russia are screaming to high heaven that if they are exposed, that if a bright light is directed upon their acts that then our unity of effort is endangered.

Now I deeply feel that any American would be faithless to his Nation if he remained silent while men of evil, whose corroded minds have served the Communists, remain in our Government to continue the corruption of the United States. Since the shooting started, we are urged to sit back in silence, to stop our criticism—yes, even to approve the decisions which led us into the traitorous Kremlin trap in Korea.

Certainly it is time for the Congress and for the 152,000,000 normal American people to serve notice that we can best fight a war abroad by disposing of the traitorous filth and the Red vermin which has accumulated at home. It is all part of the same war.

You have as a flaming backdrop to my remarks the facts of the world as you find them today. Communism is no longer a creeping threat to America. It is a racing doom that comes closer to our shore each day.

We have seen the Communist plot thicken in the blood of Poland; we watched it congeal on the corpse of China. Now it stains the streams of Korea. The Korean death trap can be laid at the doors of those men who sabotaged the congressional attempt to send arms to the anti-Communists in China, Formosa, and Korea—men whose shadows hover like vultures over the corpse of China and whose actions rip at the backbone of freedom in America.

There are those who very honestly say, "Oh, we think you are on the right track, McCARTHY, and we like the results you are getting, but we just don't like your methods. You should have done this secretly. You should not have done it in public. You should not have embarrassed the United States before the world."

As you know, the depth that the festering rot had eaten makes it necessary to cut painfully deep.

If American mothers can stand the pain of learning that their sons had their hands bound behind their backs and their faces then blown off by Communist machine guns, because we failed to provide the necessary arms to South Korea, if those mothers can stand that pain, then I am sure the American people can stand the pain of cutting deep enough to remove this cancerous Communist growth.

And in this connection, ladies and gentlemen, remember that those who shed crocodile tears for the families and friends of the Communists and the dupes and stooges of the Kremlin whom I exposed might better shed tears for the 400,000,000 people—400,000,000 of our allies—who were sold into aetheistic communistic slavery because of either the incompetence or the traitorous acts of those still doing our planning. They might better shed their tears for those young men who are today consecrating the hills and valleys of Korea with their blood. They might better shed their tears for the wives and mothers of those young men who have gone so deep into the valley of darkness and despair as a direct result of incompetence or traitorous acts.

Ladies and gentlemen, to those who say McCARTHY you have been too rough, we don't like your methods, let me say—and take my word for this—there is no way on earth that this job can be done delicately or secretly. People have been trying to do this job with kid gloves for many years and have gotten nowhere. Either I had to do a bare-knuckle job or suffer the same defeat that a vast number of well-meaning men have suffered over past years. It has been a bare-knuckle job. As long as I remain in the Senate, it will continue as a bare-knuckle job.

Charles E. Wilson's Philosophy: A Fundamental Guide for Future Labor-Management Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the friendly relations existing between the management and the employees of the General Motors Corp. have been materially strengthened by the forthright and progressive expressions of Mr. C. E. Wilson, president, in a speech delivered at the National Press Club on June 8, 1950. The speech was then followed by a brief period of questions and answers.

Altogether too often big business, as represented by its spokesmen, has been suspected and charged with lack of foresight, blind selfishness, and a total disregard for the welfare of the employee, who while he is at the bottom in the organizational graph, and guided by management, nevertheless produces the profit for himself and for the stockholder. The expressions of Mr. Wilson may well dispel all doubts, at least insofar as this giant industrial enterprise is concerned. This viewpoint indicates the future course to be followed. It assures lasting peace, increased production, and steadier, even larger, profits.

Broad gage leadership of this kind by its example will hasten and stimulate industrial conversion to the idea that management and labor have a common goal, and share responsibility as well as the credit for success. In a most forceful way, Mr. Wilson forged a strong link between General Motors, the corporate body, and its employees, the living potent force which propels and reinforces its own position in the business world.

Mr. Speaker, I could not forego the privilege of preserving in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this historic speech, which follows:

FIVE YEARS OF INDUSTRIAL PEACE

The 5-year agreement between General Motors and the UAW-CIO, promising 5 years of industrial peace in General Motors plants, was concluded on May 23, 1950. Such an agreement, settling all matters for so long a time, is unique and unprecedented, and apparently was so unexpected that many people have asked us what the big story behind it is, wondering how so much ground could be covered so quietly without pressure bargaining, wondering what motivated the parties, perhaps wondering how a big union and a big company could move so far forward so fast.

WHAT IS RIGHT AND FAIR

As a matter of fact, there is quite a story behind this agreement and it goes back far beyond the relatively short period of the recent negotiations. It is the story of building up good, workable relationships with the unions based on reason and experience over a period of years. For our part, we have always kept in mind not what might be expedient from a short-range viewpoint, but what is right and fair for our employees and the corporation now and in the years ahead. The 5-year agreement could not have been reached except for the progress made 2 years ago in adopting a formula for fair wage determination, and if the UAW-CIO had not demonstrated during this 2-year period its sincerity and responsibility in carrying out agreements.

Our thinking behind this agreement is that we want all jobs in General Motors to be good jobs. We want our employees to want to work for General Motors. Only in that way can we continue to make the kind of progress we have made in the past and build quality products for our customers. On this last depends the progress of everyone connected with the business—stockholders, dealers, suppliers, as well as employees and the unions. Customers in particular will gain by this agreement, since customers are the real victims of strikes.

The present agreement, therefore, is based upon experience, logic, and principles rather than on pressure, propaganda, and force. The principles are important and, we believe, can be applied generally. They are:

1. That it is logical, fair, and reasonable to maintain the purchasing power of an hour's work in terms of goods and services the employee must purchase in his daily living. There may be some backward countries where the mass of the people are on a subsistence level and where, as an aftermath of wars or partial crop failures, the standard of living has to be reduced, but this certainly is not the case in our prosperous Nation.

2. That all Americans look forward to improving their condition, and that workmen along with other citizens are entitled to share in the advancing prosperity of the Nation. If workmen are denied any increase in hourly wages and they can look forward only to a better standard of living through reduction of prices, the process for them is terribly slow. And in many cases the products they are producing, especially in the heavy goods industries, are not the ones they are consuming themselves. Workmen will apply themselves better to their work when they can see directly that they are getting somewhere.

3. That the way to advance the Nation's prosperity and achieve higher standards of living for all is through science and technology, taking advantage of better tools, methods, and organization and substituting machines and mechanical power for human backs.

4. That to produce more with the same amount of human effort through technological improvement is a sound economic and social objective that discards the false philosophy of made work, featherbedding, and the erroneous idea that machines take the bread out of the workmen's mouths.

5. That insecurity worries people and that it was reasonable for General Motors to assist employees in acquiring life insurance, sickness and accident benefits, hospitalization, and surgical coverage and pensions to protect them to the degree possible against the individual hazards of life.

6. That cooperation and peace rather than strife and industrial warfare will best promote the prosperity of the employees, the company and all the people and even strengthen the Nation.

THE HIGH LIGHTS OF THE AGREEMENT

A 5-year term expiring May 29, 1955, without reopening by either party for any cause.

A cost-of-living formula by which wages are adjusted each 3 months in line with changes in the Consumer Price Index of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics.

An improvement factor of 4 cents per hour added to all wage rates starting May 29, 1950, and annually thereafter for the period of the agreement.

Recognition by the parties that higher living standards depend upon technological advancements and the cooperative attitude of all parties in such progress.

A sound, funded non-contributory-pension plan integrated with Federal social security.

An insurance package, for which the Corporation pays approximately one-half the cost, covering group life insurance, continuing insurance upon retirement at no further cost to the employee, sickness and accident benefits for all employees, and hospitalization and surgical coverage for the employee's family as well as himself.

Increasing the vacation pay of employees with 15 years' service or more from the 80 hours pay they previously enjoyed to 120 hours.

An additional increase of 5 cents per hour for certain skilled jobs.

Union security which resolves the problem of a union shop in a practical and workable manner.

Retention with little or no change of the main clauses of the previous agreement such as those dealing with union recognition and responsibility, management's rights and obligations, grievance procedures, seniority, work standards, promotions and transfers, and the impartial umpire. These provisions, tested through years of experience, have been found to be fair and workable. A number of minor changes in contract language were made in other provisions to improve the agreement to the benefit of all parties.

It is well to remember in thinking about union-management agreements that under the laws of our land it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to raise wages, improve insurance plans or grant pension plans without the consent of the union that has bargaining rights. General Motors attempted to put an improved insurance plan into effect January 1, 1948, and was stopped by one of the unions that had bargaining rights in the plants. The National Labor Relations Board cited us for unfair labor practice and got out an injunction to stop the installation of the plan so that it could only be put into effect for salaried people and in certain plants where unions did not object or there were no unions. After the 1948 agreements went into effect, May 29, 1948, this union finally agreed to withdraw its complaint so that the employees would receive the benefit of the plan.

Many people do not realize that unions have such rights and think that the agreements only protect the unions and employees against reductions or decreases. As a result, the impression is created that improvement in wages, working conditions, and benefit plans are brought about year by year only by a union beating an employer over the head. Unfortunately, in collective bargaining one party or the other too often tries to gain an advantage—a bargain, like buying something for less than it is worth in a store. I think the only sound approach to collective bargaining is to work out an agreement that will clarify the rights and responsibilities of the parties and operate to the advantage of all concerned.

A CONSTRUCTIVE AGREEMENT

When we started the negotiations which led to this agreement we frankly discussed what kind of agreement the parties would try for and how we would go about it. Would we try for a pattern agreement for 2 or 3 years with annual reopenings on wages and perhaps other economic considerations, or would we make the effort to settle all matters for a much longer period of time? We said that for the ordinary kind of pattern agreement, obviously we would not try to undercut the economic considerations recently agreed to in the automotive industry. On the other hand, the union and our employes could not expect by ordinary collective bargaining to obtain benefits very much greater than had been obtained recently from other corporations in the industry. However, we said that, based on some of the principles we established 2 years ago, a really constructive agreement of an entirely different kind was possible and we would be willing to do our best to work out such an arrangement. This gave us an unusual opportunity to do the kind of things we thought we would like to do in the next 5 years for our employees, to promote both their welfare and the welfare of our business. This is how the 5-year agreement came about.

NEITHER INFLATIONARY NOR DEFLATIONARY

The cost-of-living formula by which wages are adjusted each 3 months is a continuation of the same principle used in the 1948 agreement, applied in the same way. This provision protects our employees against inflation but in itself is neither inflationary nor deflationary, but follows what other pressures have forced on the national economy. Inflation depends upon money supply, the fiscal policies of our Federal Government, credit policies of banks and finance companies, tariffs and subsidies, lack of production created by wars, strikes, export policies, or partial crop failures, none of which the employees or the Corporation have much to say about.

The annual improvement factor of 4 cents per hour is an increase of 1 cent per hour over the 3 cents provided for in the 1948 agreement. It is approximately 2½ percent of average wages. Many people think it was arrived at based on what we expect or can achieve in General Motors. This is not so. The 2½-percent annual improvement factor is somewhat less than the Nation's manufacturers have been able to achieve on the average in the last 50 years. In addition, in 50 years the standard workweek has been reduced from 60 hours to 40. The standard of living of a nation cannot be raised at the same time a war is being fought, and the census of manufacturers apparently shows little improvement on the whole between 1939 and 1947 due to strikes and union conflict and restriction of work by unions as well as the effect of the war.

The rosy forecasts of the future made by many economists, and may I say some public officials in high places, are based, if there is any hope of their realization, on this same technological improvement. We in General Motors have subscribed to what we think is the average of what the country can do. Of course, we hope to do better ourselves and, in addition to raising real wages, continue our policy of improving our products and reducing our prices. We are certain that small businesses have just as great an opportunity to improve their efficiency and their operations and take advantage of modern knowledge and technology as we have. In many instances they have greater opportunities because they are not quite so far down this road. This applies even to digging ditches, as the improvement in our modern American ditch-digging equipment over the old pick and shovel is enormous.

SHARING THE FRUITS OF TECHNOLOGY

This principle of annual improvement in real wages based on technology we also hold to be neither inflationary nor deflationary. It does share promptly with workmen part of the fruits of technology. Unit costs are not increased since productivity is assumed to increase at least as fast as hourly wages. Therefore, no price increase should result from such wage increases. On the other hand, the purchasing power of a dollar would tend to be stabilized instead of increased, as would be the case if wages were held down and prices reduced and there were no inflationary pressures. Costs of manufactured articles importantly depend on the cost of raw materials as well as labor, and the prices of many raw materials do not fluctuate directly with the labor cost of producing them. Witness the recent increase in non-ferrous-metal prices. Some people have apparently been looking forward to general wage reductions as well as price reductions, which is another way of saying they are looking forward to a deflation.

We believe that full recognition in this agreement by both parties that higher living standards depend upon technological advancements and the cooperative attitude of all parties in such progress is a very significant step ahead in labor-management relations. If there had been recognition of this principle in the agreements between the railroads and their unions, there would have been no strike over the useless second fireman on Diesel locomotives. Our new contract itself says:

"The annual improvement factor provided herein recognizes that a continuing improvement in the standard of living of employees depends upon technological progress, better tools, methods, processes, and equipment, and a cooperative attitude on the part of all parties in such progress. It further recognizes the principle that to produce more with the same amount of human effort is a sound economic and social objective."

The benefits of technology in raising the standard of living of a country can be dissipated through strikes, work restrictions, featherbedding, absenteeism, and an artificially short workweek. Without a clear understanding regarding this matter, we would not have had the courage to promise in advance a yearly increase in real wages.

Both parties completely accept the principle of progress, including the use of machines, mechanical power, and better organization, better working conditions, and better arrangement of the work in order not to waste human effort. If the people of our country really understand this principle and stick to it and are willing to work for the things they would like to have just as they have been willing to do in the past, I have no worries about our country being able to stand the costs of pensions, insurance, and high wages.

PROTECTION AGAINST HAZARDS OF LIFE

Both the insurance package and the pension plan were worked out in order to assist employees in protecting themselves against the individual hazards of life.

All parties recognize that such benefits mean some additional accounted cost, but no one can be sure to what degree these costs will be recovered through less sickness and absenteeism and through better morale and a cooperative attitude on the part of the employees. Many people have held that individual employees should pay for such benefits directly themselves from their wages, but the plan we have worked out will help employees acquire such benefits at probably lower cost than they could do it for themselves. Our plan should mean that practically all employees are covered by these benefit plans. We often forget how hard it is for the average workman to save money for a rainy day or for his old age. We have millions of salesmen abroad in our land trying to entice these same workmen and their wives to spend every last dollar they can get their hands on. It is important that the Nation's workmen should spend for what they need or feel they should have and still have reasonable security. Basically they are the customers as well as the producers who maintain the economy of our Nation. Only 40 percent of our national income is spent for subsistence living. The balance is spent for other things that give us our high American standard of living. The production, sale, and purchase of these other things depend on both the confidence and the ability to buy.

RECOGNITION FOR OLDER EMPLOYEES

Increased vacation pay for employees with 15 years or more service and the paying of one-half of the hospital and surgical coverage for the employee's family as well as himself is an effort to give added recognition to our older and more experienced employees. The additional increase of 5 cents per hour for certain skilled trades carries out this same idea.

UNION SECURITY

The union-security provisions which resolve the issue of the union shop we believe are practical and workable and reasonably carry out the intent of our present labor laws as well as the wishes of the majority of our employees affected. They should enable the union to carry out more effectively its responsibilities under the agreement while at the same time they provide job protection to the minority of our employees who for reasons of their own do not desire membership in the union. In certain labor circles there is considerable discussion over these provisions of our contract as to whether we did or did not grant a union shop. As a practical matter, any employer where unions have bargaining rights in his plants or office has a union shop not by the specific definition of the term but in a broad sense in that he must deal with the union in regard to wages, hours, and other working conditions including pensions and insurance programs. The important thing is to have the union-security provisions worked out in such a way that they reasonably protect individuals against union purges or the abuse of unionism. In other words, a workman's living cannot be taken away from him because he has gotten into a political tangle with his union.

FAIR TREATMENT FOR ALL

We put a great deal of value as a practical matter on the contract language of the agreement. Many of the important provisions of the contract have been maintained with little or no change for more than 10 years. They are very important from our point of view in maintaining efficiency and order in our plants and avoiding misunderstandings and work stoppages. They provide for the establishment of fair work standards and for fair treatment of employees. They recognize the basic principle that all individuals have a right to a hearing over any grievances they may have regarding their work. I would recommend that those who are interested or who have the practical problem in their own businesses of working out agreements with unions should give at least as much attention to the contract provisions of our agreement as they do to the more dramatic wage and benefit provisions.

We have been receiving many letters regarding this settlement—most of them favorable, a few from people who apparently still want to fight unions and from a few who are honestly questioning whether or not the contract is inflationary. I have one here, from the wife of an employee, which is very short but which says a great deal. I would like to read it to you. Here it is:

"As the wife of one of your employees, I am writing to thank you for the wonderful thing you have done. I am glad you realize men don't want to strike—and that they do have to provide for their families, and that insecurity worries people. My husband said the next day after the good news the men were happy and worked hard and well."

When 2 years ago we first recognized the quarterly cost-of-living adjustment and the annual improvement factor in determining wages, our agreement was promptly criticized by the Mine Workers' Journal and Barron's Weekly. This encouraged us. All of the workmen in our plants understood the wage formula at once and were highly pleased since they understand money as a medium of exchange. Many employers and financial people did not seem to understand the agreement so well. Perhaps they were thinking of money as capital and were wondering what this agreement did to their capital. Many of those who were skeptical of our wage-determination formula 2 years ago decided that it was probably a pretty good plan after they saw how it worked out.

This 5-year agreement was promptly criticized by the Daily Worker and certain financial writers and commentators who dubbed the agreement inflationary and not in the interest of business generally. Some even implied that the contract was not consistent with free enterprise and that it did not assure industrial peace but represented only temporary appeasement. One manufacturer took the trouble to write to a number of people prominent in national business associations. Perhaps without realizing it he took the classical reactionary position that has loaded the guns for the Communists and Socialists regularly.

AN AMERICAN SOLUTION

The problem is to work out an American solution for the relations of labor and industry and not attempt to adopt the philosophy of class conflict from Europe, either from the Communists and Socialists on the one hand or the cartel-thinking, noncompetitive reactionaries on the other. A continuation of shotgun bargaining on the pattern familiar in the coal industry certainly will not contribute to the prosperity of our country or satisfy our people.

Certainly General Motors believes in free enterprise, in producing more and better things for more people and in serving its customers well. It also believes in fair treatment of its employees and holds that this is not in conflict with treating customers right. Any business that expects to show good profits should attempt to earn them through efficiency and progress and not just by collecting a toll. It sometimes seems to me that some people who talk free enterprise intend it for others and are reluctant to face competition themselves. Some even seem to use free enterprise talk as a cloak for a little extra selfishness.

We do not expect this agreement to set a pattern of so many cents per hour or of so many dollars a month in the form of a pension nor in the form of certain insurance benefits intended to improve the health of the worker and his family. It is our hope that this agreement will set a pattern for bargaining based on principles that will insure industrial peace and prosperity and minimize strife and industrial warfare.

Chairman RADFORD E. MOBLEY, JR., president of the National Press Club. Thank you very much, Mr. Wilson. The first question is "How will your agreement affect small business; how can small business meet your terms?"

Mr. WILSON. I have never known a good businessman, whether he was engaged in what we call a small business or in a large one, who took the position that the only way his business could continue prosperous was by paying substandard wages or by operating what we call a sweatshop, or something like that.

Actually, I looked up the record of the wages in the parts companies in the automotive industry for instance. The automotive parts companies have increased their wages since 1940 by a bigger percentage on the average than have the big automobile companies.

Many people are sort of surprised to know that that is so. The smaller companies are less able to stand pressure bargaining than the large companies. They are subject to a double hazard. When the principals get into trouble with strikes their business is shut off.

When they, themselves, are pushed for wage considerations—economic improvements—they face the hazard of their own business and the loss in it, and their principals are likely to be forced to take some of the business away from them. They never get it back—not all of it. Because if you asked somebody else to help you cut in an emergency you cannot cut his throat and say, "No, I don't know you," after the thing is over. So you have to redivide the business a little bit. You can see why all those companies are very fearful about precipitating a row—and they have been edged up more in proportion than the big companies.

If I were a small-business man operating a nice little business, I would just love to take this General Motors agreement and put it right into effect right in my business. I would expect to get a fine morale from my people. I would be close enough to them so they would understand what I was up to, and they would try to help me run a good business, and I would not be afraid of the competition at all or of paying good wages to good people. That is my firm belief, and I think I have got the figures to back it up. When some folks say, "Well, how can little business keep up with a thing like this," they are not realistic about it. What did they do with the 18 cents an hour in early 1946?

What did they do to the raise in 1946 to recognize the inflation and paid holidays for workmen, as well as for salaried people, and paid vacations? What did they do about the 11 to 13 cents 2 years ago? What are they going to do about the recent insurance and pension package? They are going to step up to doing reasonably well for their employees, and the better they work it out the more successful their business is going to be.

Chairman MOBLEY. These next three questions involve predictions. I remember, sir, that you are a good prognosticator. When you last talked to us in 1946, we thought the ceiling was falling through the floor with prices. You said, in a general way, that the prices of automobiles will go up before they come down.

You were quite right. Perhaps we should ask you to predict the November elections. We newsmen did not do too well the last time.

These questions say:

1. Is it fair to assume that General Motors is betting that business will be very good during the next 5 years, with General Motors at least, and that costs and prices will continue upward?

2. How many passenger cars do you expect will be produced by the industry in 1950, 1951, and 1952?

3. How high will GM stock go?

Mr. WILSON. On the question of how high General Motors stock will go, it makes me think of an experience I had in Texas a number of years ago. I was asked the same question and I said, "Now you men down here are in the cattle and oil business. You just figure out where you think the price of oil is going and the price of beef, and General Motors stock prices are probably going to move right along with those two things."

Our business is so big that we are going to go along with the prosperity of our country. There is no way that I know of where we can have a marvelously successful business in General Motors and have the business of the country not doing very well.

I just sort of let that price of the stock take care of itself and I worry about things I have something to do about.

On the rest of the question, I do not know what the production is going to be this year. It looks like it would be well over 7,000,000 cars and trucks in the United States. I do have to say this: the shortage of cars in General Motors is worse than it was a year ago or 2 years ago; also, in spite of the fact that we are producing at about a 30 or 35 percent higher rate than we were last year, our dealers actually have fewer cars in their places of business than they had this time last year.

I am personally getting on the fire again from some of my friends because they can't get their Cadillacs delivered. It is really a marvelous business. And it is marvelous because our cars do so much for people and there is so much value in them.

Mr. MOBLEY. That is our commercial. [Laughter.]

Some people question whether the 5-year GM contract holds promise of freedom from strikes by the union that it has been advertised as having.

The basis for this question is a decision in April by the NLRB. In that case NLRB held that a CIO union holding a 2-year contract with the Wilson Packing Co. was free to strike 3 months after signing the contract. The union had a no-strike pledge in its contract and it had filed a 60-day notice required by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Do you think that under this decision to UAW has a license from the NLRB to strike during its 5-year pact with GM?

Mr. WILSON. I am not a lawyer, but I don't think so. Our whole contract projects the good intent and faith of the parties, and I don't know just exactly where I would run to if General Motors started out to break that agreement. I don't think I would have the face to try to negotiate another one, and I don't think the union boys would either. I think they are going to carry out this agreement and they are going to do it well.

Now, we have always been careful in our union agreements to make sure we understand each other. As a matter of fact, after we worked out this whole thing and stayed up all night, Monday night—these things always have to be settled at night, for some reason or other; I am getting sort of old to stay up all night, but I can still do it and did—but here is what the waiver, as we call it, says. If this doesn't say there are not going to be any strikes in General Motors for 5 years, I don't understand English:

"The parties acknowledge that during the negotiations which resulted in this agreement each had the unlimited right and opportunity to make demands and proposals with respect to any subject or matter not removed by law from the area of collective bargaining, and that the understandings and agreements arrived at by the parties after the exercise of that right and opportunity are set forth in this agreement.

"Therefore, the corporation and the union, for the life of this agreement, each voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right, and each agrees that the other shall not be obligated, to bargain collectively with respect to any subject or matter referred to, or covered in this agreement, or with respect to any subject or matter not specifically referred to or covered in this agreement, even though such subjects or matters may not have been within the knowledge or contemplation of either or both of the parties at the time that they negotiated or signed this agreement."

Now, what does that sound like? That is the understanding of the parties, and I am sure the parties are going to try to live up to it independent of what the National Labor Relations Board says.

Mr. MOBLEY. In view of General Motors' success and the general prosperity today, do you believe you were wrong in asking that the 40-hour week be waived after the war?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. That was the only way we could have avoided a big inflation and an increase in prices. I was a little disappointed that some more people didn't join up and try it. I noticed Mr. Baruch came out for it about a year and a half late, but we had established a high take-home pay and a good standard of living, so far as purchasing power was concerned, for workmen during the war by going from a 40- to a 48-hour week; so if we had taken several years to work back down to the 40-hour week, like we did when we went from 48 hours to 40 before, we would have given management time for these technological improvements I talk about so much. Accordingly, we could have come along year by year and knocked the work week down and not cut the take-home pay and wages of the people.

You couldn't do it with the one big jump of 30 percent. We have committed ourselves to 2½ percent a year and we are going to make it and more, to promote our business. But that 30 percent jump in one flip in the fall of 1945, we couldn't take, and the only thing that could have been done to maintain approximate wages and prices would have been to work longer for a while until we recovered the losses of the war in terms of production—not in terms of money, but in terms of goods and services.

That is the only way it could have been done. It is too bad we didn't try it.

Mr. MOBLEY. We have time for two more questions. This says: To what extent does General Motors benefit from the Marshall plan? Does the corporation have many military orders?

Mr. WILSON. We don't have very much military business. We do feel a responsibility to work along with our Government, our military people, in their defense program.

We know, just as we did 10 years ago, that if this country ever has another war the country is going to need General Motors awfully bad, and we want to be ready to do a good job promptly. So we are working along with those responsible—not to make money out of the military program, but to be ready if we have the terrible job to do.

Mr. MOBLEY. This last question is very brief, only four words: Why these stock split-ups?

Mr. WILSON. I think there are two or three reasons for it. There is a general impression that if the stock doesn't sell at too high a figure in dollars per share, more people will buy—the little people will buy ten shares. We think the present economy of our country calls for the "folks" to put some capital in our enterprises, too, and we would like to see more stockholders in General Motors. That is one of the reasons.

The second reason, perhaps, is it just got to be the style. A lot of other big companies, after 20 years or so, split their shares. You men who are familiar with the financial business can list them for yourselves. We are one of the last ones that got around to it.

The dollars aren't quite the same kind of dollars they were, as you all know, in 1940. We have invested a great deal more money in General Motors to modernize our plant and get good working conditions for the men, and the finest tools that we know how to produce in our country or we know how to think up ourselves as improved ways of doing things.

So we thought it was a good thing to increase the number of shares. There was some argument about it in the family. Some of the men said: "It won't change the real equities of the owners at all." But the psychology of it seemed to favor a stock split.

That is the best I can do with that one. It is a little out of my part of the business, anyway.

Mr. MOBLEY. Mr. Wilson, the National Press Club admires you a great deal. We always appreciate your coming down to talk with us. We want to thank you for coming here today.

Tolerance Essential to a Free Society—Charles E. Wilson Speaks Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, what might properly be termed as a sequel to a previous and farsighted declaration by Mr. C. E. Wilson, president of General Motors, Corp., is herewith submitted for the Appendix of the RECORD. Mr. Wilson's views further clarify his philosophy as it bears upon human needs and relations in and out of industry.

Mr. Wilson delivered his speech before the National Conference of Christians and Jews held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City, on Tuesday evening, October 3, 1950.

Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. Baruch, members of the National Conference of Christians and Jews, and guests, it is a high honor that has been bestowed upon me this evening. I greatly appreciate both the brotherhood award and the way it was presented.

When the National Conference of Christians and Jews was founded some 22 years ago it stated that its objective is "to promote justice, amity, understanding, and cooperation among Protestants, Catholics, and Jews, and to analyze, moderate, and finally eliminate intergroup prejudices which disfigure and distart religious, business, social, and political relations, with a view to the establishment of a social order in which the religious ideals of brotherhood and justice shall become the standards of human relationships."

This objective is a plea for tolerance. But it is also far more than tolerance. Tolerance alone is negative. Your objective is founded on a positive concept of mutual respect, based on the common ethical principles of the Judaeo-Christian tradition, which include among others the following premises:

1. That man is more than a mere animal, in that he has a mind to know the truth and a will to determine his own course of action.
2. That man has sacred rights derived from God.
3. That man also has responsibilities to God and to his fellow men.
4. That all men are brothers before God.
5. That the Ten Commandments are a universal code for all men.

It is from this same ethical tradition that Thomas Jefferson took the basic principles upon which our Government was founded, so brilliantly set forth in the second paragraph of the Declaration of Independence:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Upon that ethical foundation the founding fathers framed the Constitution of our United States. In the light of this same ethical background they recognized the necessity of restricting the authority of Government in order to protect these basic personal rights. From this flowed the Bill of Rights, the very first article of which stated that—

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of people peacefully to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Great personal freedom from man-made tyranny and great material benefits to all humanity have flowed from these inspired and highly successful efforts to create a free society founded on these religious and ethical principles, thus fulfilling for at least part of the world the hopes and aspirations of all men to be free.

From far-away India comes much the same thinking regarding the basic rights of man. To quote the words of Mahatma Gandhi published in an Indian magazine at about the time of his death:

"Individual freedom alone can make a man voluntarily surrender himself completely to the service of society. If it is wrested from him, he becomes an automaton, and society is ruined. No society can possibly be built on a denial of individual freedom. It is contrary to the very nature of man, and just as a man will not grow horns or a tail so he will not exist as man if he has no mind of his own. In reality even those who do not believe in the liberty of the individual believe in their own."

To my way of thinking, such wisdom, if followed, is a good omen for the new nation of India.

Under these liberal concepts of government great social and economic progress has been made in our western world in the last two centuries. About 100 years ago other social and economic doctrines were advanced by Karl Marx and others. These doctrines denied in their entirety the ethical foundation of our political and economic system. Marx and Engels, with their doctrine of dialectic materialism, directly challenged our religious institutions and teachings. Their teachings tend to undermine all religions and to substitute communism, or some form of socialism, for religious beliefs. They falsely claim that their philosophy is a liberal philosophy and promise that it will greatly benefit the common man.

In the last 30 years our western civilization has been increasingly challenged by the followers of these collectivist doctrines. Wherever people have adopted collectivism they have lost their individual freedom, and dictatorship has been the result. Not only have they suffered in the loss of their liberty and in spiritual degradation but the promised material benefits have not materialized. In addition, in many cases, the world has witnessed a resurgence of the most savage barbarism. The world is in danger of slipping backward, not just to the horse-and-buggy days but back to the chariots of the Caesars and the elephants of the Hannibals, and I fear back to the pagan disregard of human life and of the dignity of the individual. The fundamental principles of communism are so diametrically opposite to the ethical principles on which our western civilization is based that these Communist dictators promptly attempted to suppress the churches and all religions advocating the rights of the individual. This is forcing our religious organizations, through their leaders, to take a positive position against communism and socialism and all other forms of government that deny the basic inalienable personal rights of men. Religious leaders especially stand to lose not only their property and standard of living but their spiritual integrity as well.

Many times in past centuries whole nations have suffered greatly and much blood has been shed because some religious group demanded complete conformity of whole populations in religious matters and control over their temporal affairs. Conversion by the sword, however, has never been successful. Land areas can be taken by force, but force cannot capture men's minds. Ultimately the pen proves to be mightier than the sword. The fundamental religious principles that people believe must have free expression if those people are to endure.

In speaking of religious tolerance, I would like to make the sharp distinction between tolerance and indifference. I am sure that tolerance, including religious tolerance, is essential to a free society, but I am even more convinced that no free society can continue to exist unless the great majority of its citizens subscribe to ethical principles and a moral code that develops self-respect and self-discipline on the part of individuals and recognition of the individual citizen's basic obligations to others. With this background he will be willing to concede to others the same rights that he wishes to enjoy himself.

The wars and conflicts of the past that arose over religious differences or imperialistic efforts to capture lands and resources are being replaced by conflicts arising from efforts to capture, control, and direct men's minds. In this world-wide conflict between the ideology of collectivism and the philosophy of personal freedom it seems clear to me that all of our religious leaders must take a position in favor of personal freedom and of our western type of civilization, since it is based on the ethical principles that are the very foundation of their religions. The leaders of religious groups have always had a problem of the extent to which their religious responsibilities require them to take positions regarding current social and economic affairs. For religious leaders to take a proper and sound position in the present world conflict without appearing to attempt domination of temporal affairs and without increasing friction between states and nations is difficult, but the issue must be faced. Collectivism, which denies individual freedom, is contrary to the very nature of man, and to force communism on a people requires dictatorship, and the entire population must conform to the will of the dictator lest his rule be weakened as the people realize the truth and the false philosophy on which his rule is based be broken down as the people assert their liberties. In contrast, the republics and democracies of the world are based on respect for the rights of individuals. They tend to be tolerant of the thinking and beliefs of all peoples, even to the point where the interests and aspirations of the liberty-loving majority may be jeopardized by violent minorities dominated by totalitarian beliefs or by individuals who preach communism as a cloak to further their ruthless ambitions. This, too, poses a difficult issue. When does free speech become sedition? How far should free nations go in protecting enemies of freedom in their efforts to destroy freedom itself?

At times, in past centuries, great masses of the people have been subjected to extreme hardships and violence with religion as a front for the ambitions of ruthless leaders. Again today great masses of people are being subjected to hardship and violence to advance the principles of collectivism and to further the ambitions of a few dictators who falsely claim that their actions will result in the greatest good for the greatest number. I am convinced that the peoples of the world want peace, not war. Through the centuries of the recorded history dictators, no matter how they have achieved their power, have been responsible for most of our disastrous wars.

Fortunately or unfortunately, we are all animals as well as human beings, and are subject to the same needs and laws that control the animal kingdom. As animals we must have food, clothing, and shelter, but these things alone will not satisfy our desires as human beings. To keep a people prosperous and happy sound policies must be followed which contribute to both physical and spiritual well-being and to economic and social progress. The Bible recognizes clearly this dual nature of man. In Genesis appears the line, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," but Deuteronomy adds, "Man doth not live by bread alone." The promises made in the name of communism especially appeal to people living in poverty and misery and whose pressing animal needs seem to be more important than their spiritual welfare.

Our modern western society by the use of machinery and mechanical power and specialization of labor has given each of us a great deal more for our labor, but at the same time it has made us increasingly dependent upon one another. As our means of communication and transportation have improved and the world has grown relatively smaller whole nations are becoming more dependent upon one another. As we become more interdependent clearly it is necessary that we become more understanding and more tolerant of one another's problems, for only by effectively working together is it possible for us to maintain our own existence. Today even a farmer, who has traditionally been considered economically the most independent among us, is himself dependent for his very existence upon the smooth functioning of our industrial order. He must have a market for his surplus. He lights his lamps and operates his milking machine with electricity produced by a power company which uses machinery made in Pittsburgh or Schenectady and coal mined in Kentucky or Virginia or oil from Texas. This power comes to him through wires made in Connecticut out of copper from Montana or Utah. He hauls his produce in a truck made in Michigan (or maybe even in South Bend), powered by gasoline from oil out of the Southwest. He pays taxes to help support the Marshall plan. His son may be fighting in Korea. Break the spirit of willing cooperation and existence becomes a very difficult problem, an impossible one for most of us. In our modern western civilization we must have a spirit of tolerance and cooperate with others if we are to maintain our standard of living. And to an even greater degree we must respect one another's view and make real progress in our social and economic relations if we are to preserve our liberties.

It is increasingly clear that our large industrial corporations are not merely economic institutions, but that they have social responsibilities and problems as well—that business decisions and policies must be made and adopted not only in the light of short- and long-term economic factors but also with due recognition of pertinent social values and possible social reactions. We in General Motors believe and hope that we are making an important contribution to the economic progress of our country. We also hope and believe that we are contributing to the stability and social well-being of our thousands of employees and of all those who are affected by our business. Our American industry, with its development of mechanical power, better tools, and better organization of human effort, is making possible material benefits and a standard of living for all people that only kings dreamed about a couple of centuries ago. We believe the actions of our large American industrial organizations are the economic expression of the same fundamental principles that are the basis of our political institutions and our religious beliefs.

The advocates of Government-planned economy and of Socialist and communistic states appeal to envy, prejudice, and greed in the effort to discredit accomplishment and to further their totalitarian ambitions. They attempt to discredit the great accomplishments of our free society by magnifying a few of its weaknesses or defects. They get the people's confidence by promising great improvement in their physical welfare if they will adopt the Communist society. By the time the people find that these promises are not fulfilled they are already trapped. It is too late. They have gone down a one-way street. In terms of the history of the world, our type of free society is relatively young, and I am sure that none of us would take the position that it is perfect and cannot be improved. But on analysis of the facts we have made more progress for more people in less time, both in terms of physical goods produced and consumed and as human beings, than ever was made before in the history of the world.

Our free society, based on the religious concept of individual freedom, has recognized the importance of the individual and his rights and obligations, has given him positive incentives for accomplishment and provided opportunities for all. This has promoted and rewarded the initiative of the millions, thereby producing this great economic and social progress. I am sure that no society, based on state planning from the top or regimentation of all individuals with a resulting curtailment of initiative and opportunity, can produce an equally prosperous and happy society.

In these troublesome times, we must understand and renew our faith in our fundamental beliefs, and make sure that in our efforts to solve the problems of our times and of our daily living we do not adopt policies which violate these fundamental principles.

My special plea tonight is that all of us should work to further social and economic progress based on the common ethical principles of our religions and as expressed in the Constitution of our country. I am sure that this is the way to combat the false philosophies of communism and state planning, and that only through a clear demonstration of the material and spiritual benefits of our free system can we convert others to it. While I believe we, as well as the people of all other free nations, must at all times be prepared to defend ourselves against invasion, and be willing to help each other when attacked, I do not believe that communism can be vanquished by the sword, that bullets will kill ideas, no matter how wrong these ideas may be. We must vigorously oppose this false philosophy and the dictators who are promoting it but not the people who are being misled by it. Only when the great masses of the people of the world understand the basis of our prosperity and freedom and understand and accept the fundamental truths that we believe, will we have a secure foundation for peace in the world. Efforts of organizations such as yours to establish the brotherhood of man in a free society are certainly making progress in the right direction. Only the truth can keep us free.

Reclamation and Conservation of Water Resources Never Has Been and Should Not Be a Partisan Party Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I read with amazement and disappointment the statement of my colleague Congresswoman HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of September 22, 1950.

I do not believe that reclamation and the conservation of water resources ever has been a partisan party issue. The Reclamation Act of 1902 was passed by a Republican Congress. President Theodore Roosevelt was really the father of the idea. The general policies outlined in that act, with certain additions and improvements, have been recommended and supported by every succeeding President. The differences regarding what should be done in the conservation of waters and in the reclamation of arid areas has never followed party lines. Furthermore, I am firmly convinced that these problems should not follow party lines.

To make reclamation and water conservation a party issue would in my opinion be very damaging to the cause which we are trying to foster.

It is interesting to note for instance that when the Central Valley project began to take shape that the approval of it by the Legislature of California and by the people of California was not gained through the efforts of any of the political parties, as such. It was a nonpartisan effort of a great group of people who saw in the development of the Central Valley project the key to the destiny of California. Many people and numerous groups and interests opposed the project. Nevertheless it was approved by a substantial majority at the polls.

Later during the great depression, when our State turned to the National Government for aid, two of the leading spokesmen for the aid were Republican Congressmen B. W. Gearhart, of Fresno, and Richard J. Welch, of San Francisco. Undoubtedly the entire California delegation participated in the request but the two mentioned above are the only ones who personally have told me of that historic meeting with Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I have been told that when the President was informed of the project and the purpose and nature of it, he wanted to know why they were asking the National Government for aid for a project that concerned itself exclusively with intrastate waters. The streams involved, together with their watersheds, are all within the confines of California. President Roosevelt, according to my informants, pointed out to those present that since no interstate streams were involved, he was in doubt as to the legality of Federal aid to this project. Furthermore, there was no undeveloped public arid land which might be reclaimed by this project as was the case in most of the reclamation projects previous to that time. However, some of those present pointed out to President Roosevelt that the major dam of the project, namely Shasta Dam, would have the effect of regulating the waters of the Sacramento River. The Sacramento River is a navigable stream and has been navigated from time immemorial. It was pointed out that millions of dollars had been spent in trying to control the flow of that stream. It was further pointed out that much Federal money had been spent in an effort to reduce silting and control floods on the Sacramento. The Federal Government having control of and jurisdiction over navigable streams, it was suggested that it was legal for the Federal Government to appropriate money to be used for the development of the Central Valley project. On that fine thread the first aid given was in the amount of $10,000 and was the amount which the President recommended as the initial contribution largely to determine, by investigation, whether or not Federal money could be lawfully spent on the project. It is known by everyone that from that date on Mr. Roosevelt was a stanch supporter of the project and that hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated in the development and construction of the project, the completion of which is now in sight.

In an effort to get the committees of Congress to understand the project and to appropriate money for its development, numerous Congressmen have given aid, including Mrs. DOUGLAS and the author of this statement. Differences of opinion as to the various phases of the project have arisen. For instance, Mrs. DOUGLAS and myself have on numerous occasions advocated the construction and ownership by the Government of transmission lines to carry the electricity developed at the power plant below the Shasta Dam. This policy has been violently opposed in the House by members of both parties. For instance, my good friend Jed Johnson, who left Congress some time ago and who was for years chairman of the Subcommittee on Interior Appropriations, did not believe in that principle. I merely mention this to point out that no party can claim that it alone is the friend of reclamation and the development and conservation of our waterways. The statement was made in the extension of my colleague that "because the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress sharply curtailed progress on the Central Valley project, the San Joaquin Valley does not have enough water to supply its ever-increasing demands."

I do not believe that is the correct conclusion nor a correct statement of facts. It is true that the Eightieh Congress gave less money than I personally wished they had appropriated. However, that Congress was trying to balance the budget, and did balance it. It is well known that the budgets of the Truman administration have been unbalanced. This is one of the major reasons why we have the terrible rash of inflation which is punishing every family in America today. No matter if they had given more money, the project would not have been completed as no Congress, irrespective of its political complexion, would have given enough during the period that the Eightieth Congress was in session to have completed the project by this time. It is also well known that the Delta-Mendota canal was not completed as early as it should have been and as a result the Reclamation Bureau was enjoined from diverting water to the south into the Friant-Kern canal. The injunction was granted by a judge who is a Democrat, appointed by a Democratic President. His decision was based on purely legal grounds, without any consideration whatever of party policies.

The effort to assail one party or the other for their deficiencies in reclamation development will not bring the progress to which the projects are entitled. Neither party can claim all the credit nor take all the blame in these matters. For the good of the projects, it is better to have a situation, which by and large has been the situation up to now, where the question is not which party is in control when appropriations are made for their development but what is the merit of any particular project. I hope I will never see the day when a project is considered on the basis of the political affiliation of those who support it and the secret question asked by the committeemen listening to the evidence is, "Are the supporters of the project of our political affiliation?" The only attitude that the committee should take, and I believe this has been their attitude, is what are the merits of the claim being made for any particular project and what amount of money is a reasonable amount to appropriate and which can be best utilized during the coming fiscal year?

Sometimes zealots on both sides of the problem try to enmesh or utilize reclamation projects for political advantage. For instance, when Secretary of Interior Krug made a trip in the fall of 1948 to Arizona and to Vallejo, Calif., to make an announcement in those particular areas that two certain projects had been approved by him, in my opinion, that was merely done for the purpose of trying to indicate to those areas that the Democratic administration had been kind enough to approve two projects in which those areas were interested, and consequently the voters should express their gratitude by Democratic votes. That trip was a distinct disservice to the reclamation program. The Secretary could have made that announcement in Washington, filed his report, in which he declared the project to be feasible, with the Speaker of the House. It would then be eligible for appropriations. It did not need any trip to the western coast with the personal appearance of the Secretary just before election time to indicate that the project had been found feasible and it was recommended as such by the Secretary of the Interior. That trip was such an obvious political one that I hated to see it be tied to any reclamation project. The statement by Mrs. DOUGLAS is along the same line. For instance she says:

> Today, thanks to renewed progress on the Central Valley project under a Democratic controlled Congress, farmers in the Chow Chilla water district will get the water they need.

Some of the very works that enable them to get this water were built by money appropriated by a Republican Congress. In fact, it is not now certain exactly when the water will be delivered but the contract for its delivery has been signed.

I think that Gov. Earl Warren, of California, has done more than any other single individual, in or out of Congress, to get appropriations for the Central Valley project. He has taken the time to come to Washington from his busy job as Governor of California to plead with the appropriate committees of Congress for aid in the rapid development of our Central Valley project. I know that his presence has had tremendous influence on the committees to whom he has talked. For instance, that great friend of reclamation, Congressman MICHAEL KIRWAN, devoted a great part of his presentation of the Central Valley project items in the appropriation bill for fiscal 1948 to eulogizing the Governor and praising his efforts for coming to Washington to explain the need of California for appropriations in order that the Central Valley project could be rapidly brought to completion. What greater testimony could there be that reclamation and the conservation of our waters is not a political problem—is not a partisan problem—than the testimony of Mr. KIRWAN, who has been our stanch friend in support of money for this project ever since I came to Congress? The members of the subcommittee itself at various times that I have appeared before them—and I have appeared before them at every session of Congress since I have been here—have been divided within the parties. Some members of the Democrats do not believe, like Mr. KIRWAN does, that the transmission lines should be owned by the Reclamation Bureau. On the Republican side we, likewise, have a division of opinion sometimes, some believing that the public should own transmission lines and some being opposed to it; some saying we are emphasizing hydroelectric-power development too much and irrigation too little, and so forth. The net result has been that we have fared rather well considering all the other expenses our Government has had to face during the past few years. I hope that when I go to a committee and discuss the water problems of California, either to get authority for a project or to get money for it, that no member of the committee will look at me and inquire whether I am a Republican or a Democrat. I hope that all he will say is, "What merit is there in the statement that Mr. JOHNSON makes regarding the project involved? Is it sound? Is it feasible? Is it practical and does our fiscal situation permit us to give money to the project at this time?" Is these can be answered in the affirmative, I hope that no member will hesitate to grant my plea, and especially will not consider what my particular party affiliation is.

Communist Infiltration of the Scientific Profession

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the following statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The ranks of American scientists have been infiltrated to an alarming degree by the Communist enemies of the United States. This real threat to the Nation's security is a matter which has either been ignored by the Atomic Energy Commission or treated far too lightly by this vital administrative agency of the Government.

It is the same old story of softness toward Communists which has prevailed in the State Department and the Department of Justice these many years.

Klaus Fuchs and Harry Gold are not isolated phenomena in their betrayals of this country's vital scientific secrets. Their cases are a part of a general pattern of Communist infiltration of the scientific profession.

The startling fact is that at least 500 scientists whose biographies are listed in American Men of Science have been openly affiliated with the Communist movement through its deceitful and seditious front organizations. Any scientist who is anybody in the world of science is listed in this authentic reference work.

It may be countered by some apologists for subversion that 500 represents a small and insignificant percentage of the 50,000 scientists whose biographies are given in American Men of Science, but the fact remains that even a 1 percent incidence of disloyalty among scientists may strike at the very heart of our national security. Furthermore, the very eminence of these 500 Communists and fellow travelers among scientists is a shocking phenomenon in American life, and their scientific prominence more than makes up for their relatively small percentage of the whole scientific profession. Included in this list of 500 are some of the "scientific greats" of all time.

What, one may ask, can be the controlling motive which prompts a man of science to betray the country which honors him and his profession and affords him unparalleled opportunity? It is apparent that we must look beyond such base or sordid motives as economic advantage or hatred for the institutions of this country for an answer to that question. The Communists are far too shrewd to attempt any appeal to scientists generally on the basis of pure selfishness or class hatred. It would appear from the record that spurious or misapplied notions of "world brotherhood" and "the internationalism of science" underlie, for the most part, the behavior of those scientists who affiliate with the Communist or the Communist-front movement and, thereby, lend their great prestige to subversion.

Several publishing events of recent days have brought into sharp focus the issue of our national security, as it is affected by the Communist infiltration of the scientific ranks of the United States and as it is met by Government administrative agencies.

First, we have the publication of a book entitled "Security, Loyalty, and Science," by Prof. Walter F. Gellhorn, of Columbia University. This volume, published by the Cornell University Press, is a not-to-subtle effort to hold the very idea of loyalty clearance for atomic scientists up to public scorn and ridicule.

Second, we have several reviews of the Gellhorn book attempting to give it favorable acceptance by the public. It received enthusiastic support from book reviewers of several New York newspapers—the same New York papers, incidentally, which gave such favorable reviews to Owen Lattimore's recent book. In addition to these widely read New York reviews, a national magazine gave considerable publicity to Professor Gellhorn's book a short time ago in an article entitled "Danger: We're Headed for a Russianized America."

Third, we have a series of articles in the New York Journal-American, written by the paper's financial editor, Leslie Gould, under the title "The Story of Senator MACMAHON." This series of articles has disclosed the amazing information that the top employee in the office of the chairman of the Congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy was a man whose Communist connections led him to write for the Communist Party's New Masses and to espouse the Communist-inspired and Communist-directed campaign of Henry A. Wallace for the the Presidency in 1948. This man was the late Charles E. Calkins.

These publishing events call for some elaboration of their significance.

I propose to show that Prof. Walter F. Gellhorn was completely disqualified to approach any study of loyalty and security in an impartial frame of mind. Gellhorn's conclusions could hardly be other than self-serving, human nature being what it is, and Gellhorn's prior attitudes having been what they were.

For more than 10 years, Prof. Walter F. Gellhorn has been allergic to all investigations of un-American activities, at the slightest contact with which he breaks out with a rash of words.

Gellhorn was incompetent for the job of examining loyalty and security programs and should have been disqualified on the following grounds:

1. He has a personal stake in finding against the Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities;

2. On April 19, 1943, he was subjected to examination as a witness by the congressional committee, which confronted him with evidence of his own Communist-front activities and connections;

3. He has collaborated with known Communists in their enterprises;

4. He has been affiliated with Communist organizations cited as subversive by the congressional committee;

5. On more than one occasion, he has published embittered articles against the congressional committee;

6. He has admitted under oath that he had probably signed an attack on the Congressional committee's record without ever having read or seen any part of it, i. e., the committee's hearings;

7. In at least one instance, he falsified the congressional committee's printed record, and in so doing, contradicted his own sworn testimony;

8. He has written an article in the Harvard Law Review in defense of a notorious Communist-front organization;

9. He has claimed, under oath, complete ignorance of the simplest facts about the American Communist Party; and

10. He has been a well-known enemy of the House Committee on Un-American Activities for a period of more than 10 years.

Almost a year before the publication of Professor Gellhorn's volume; the Communists had formed a favorable impression of it and anticipated that it would be a contribution in the field of political science. The Communists and their fellow travelers know their friends better than these friends know themselves. The November 5, 1949, issue of the New York Teachers News carried an editorial by its Communist editor, Abraham Lederman, which looked forward to the appearance of Professor Gellhorn's book in the following words:

"Of course I cannot venture an opinion as to the validity of the conclusions the study will reach, but I did get the impression, when a Columbia professor participating in the project interviewed me this summer * * * that the results would represent a contribution in the field of political science."

The 10 points which I have cited as disqualifying Professor Gellhorn from writing an impartial book on the questions involved in loyalty and security, can be documented to the hilt.

Gellhorn's general method of trying to discredit loyalty investigations is to cite a few anonymous cases in which absurd questions were allegedly asked by the investigators. Inasmuch as everything is strictly anonymous, you must take Gellhorn's word for it that these questions were asked of some unnamed Government employees or prospective employees by unnamed investigators on unnamed dates at unnamed places. Such is the character of Professor Gellhorn's research.

Professor Gellhorn and the reviewers who have favorably publicized his book reveal a degree of ignorance about the Communist movement which is truly appalling and which, if made the basis of our national policy, would be dangerous in the highest degree. It would require another book to set down the full details of this ignorance (assuming that it is not, in all cases, deliberate distortion). Communist espionage would find its pathway very considerably smoothed if the American people could be frightened by the hobgoblin of totalitarianism into abandoning their insistence that the loyalty of atomic scientists be thoroughly checked before they are given access to secrets which are vital to our national security.

I must limit myself to a single illustration of Gellhorn's ignorance (or was it deliberate misrepresentation) of the facts about Communist organizations in this country. On pages 141–142 of his book, he depicts the American Russian Institute as a very respectable (if not, indeed, conservative) organization and, by clear implication, assails Attorney General Tom Clark for his listing of the American Russian Institute as a Communist organization. While stating several facts about the American Russian Institute (proving that he did some research on the subject), Gellhorn omits the relevant fact that Henry H. Collins is executive director of the organization. Is it possible that Gellhorn did not know this? Or is it possible that he did not know that Henry H. Collins has been named as a member of the Communist espionage cell in the Federal Government which included Alger Hiss, Harry Dexter White, Dean Acheson's law partner, Donald Hiss, John Abt, Nathan Witt, Lee Pressman, and Gregory Silvermaster? Such convenient omissions of fact pervade the book of Professor Gellhorn—convenient in the sense that it serves the interests of the Communist Party at a crucial moment in our national history.

It may have been unintentional, but Gellhorn's book reveals the sloppy thinking of some of the Nation's outstanding educators and scientists.

In May 1949, Fulton Lewis, Jr., revealed that the self-proclaimed Communist Hans Friestadt had been granted a $1,600 fellowship by the Atomic Energy Commission for study at the University of North Carolina. The matter was wholly newsworthy but, despite this obvious fact, Gellhorn writes that a radio sensationalist had reported it. The objective and impartial Columbia University professor refrained from naming Fulton Lewis Jr., but resorted instead to the use of an epithet in identifying this prominent radio broadcaster.

After recording the fact that a radio sensationalist (as he put it) had reported the appointment of Communist Hans Freistadt to a $1,600 fellowship by the Atomic Energy Commission, Professor Gellhorn went on in his usual effort to portray the American people as mad with anti-Communist hysteria—a caricature which is far from the truth but which is parallel to the line of the Communist Party. Among other things, he wrote: "The juxtaposition of 'atom' and 'Communist' stimulated a fervor of response which was undiminished by the sobering facts that the fellowships involved no danger to secrets of any description." Gellhorn overlooks the simple fact that, regardless of his own favorable reaction to subsidizing Communists with taxpayers' money, the American people see no reason whatever for the Atomic Energy Commission to spend the people's money in training avowed enemies of the United States. Would Gellhorn advocate spending taxpayers' money to train avowed Nazis in the field of nuclear fission or in any other field.

Gellhorn cites with approval the incredibly naive argument of Alfred Newton Richards, vice president of the University of Pennsylvania and president of the National Academy of Science, who urged that educating a qualified person, even if a Communist, "will have added one more to the group—now far too small—of those capable of utilizing knowledge of nuclear energy and of its products in the advancement of medicine, biology, agriculture, and, at need, could release for Government classified service another who possessed no disqualifications. The country will have been the gainer by his training." Gellhorn and Richards, in their consummate ignorance of communism, do not seem to understand that every Communist is a potential espionage agent for the Soviet Government, and that every such agent trained at the expense of American taxpayers releases the Soviet plotters from the financial responsibility of training its own agents.

Professor Gellhorn alleges, without quoting him directly, that Detlev W. Bronk, president of Johns Hopkins University and chairman of the National Research Council as well as the patron of Owen Lattimore, echoed the fantastic nonsense of Alfred Newton Richards. It should, of course, be noted that all of Gellhorn's indictments of distinguished scientists and educators are unwitting.

Unwittingly, Professor Gellhorn places the president of Harvard University, Dr. James B. Conant, in a most unfavorable light by quoting him to the effect that "a naive scientist or a philosopher with strong loyalties to the advancement of civilization and the unity of the world" might be a questionable asset for Government service but "extremely valuable to a university." In describing a Communist scientist as one who believes in the "advancement of civilization and the unity of the world," President Conant was quoting the "defense" of the convicted traitor, Alan Nunn May, and other atomic scientists who have betrayed civilization to the red-handed murderers of the Kremlin.

In a totally different category from the writings of Gellhorn and the several reviews to which I have referred is the series of articles by Leslie Gould, entitled "The Story of Senator McMahon."

I have already called attention to Gould's disclosure that Charles E. Calkins, clearly pro-Communist in his connections if not indeed a card-carrying member of the Communist Party, was the top man on the payroll for 3 years of the Senator from Connecticut who is also chairman of the Congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

The Connecticut Senator's personal appointee as his scientific adviser on atomic energy was none other than Dr. Edward U. Condon, Director of the Federal Bureau of Standards.

Despite its own regulations, which I shall discuss later, the Atomic Energy Commission has given security clearance to Dr. Condon.

The Communists have made two major organizational efforts to enlist American scientists in fronts, namely, the now-defunct American-Soviet Science Society and the existing American Association of Scientific Workers. About the latter I shall have more to say.

Dr. Edward U. Condon was a member of the executive committee of the American-Soviet Science Society, a front which has been cited as subversive and Communist by the Attorney General. Condon was not only a member of this organization's executive committee; he was an active solicitor of memberships for the outfit. On April 15, 1946, he personally addressed a letter soliciting members from among the physicists of the entire country.

Condon's fellow officers in the American-Soviet Science Society included the notorious Columbia University Communist, Prof. Bernhard J. Stern.

When the House Committee on Un-American Activities attempted to obtain the loyalty file on Dr. Condon from the Department of Commerce, its efforts were blocked by orders from the White House. There was, however, every reason to believe that Condon's loyalty file contained much damaging and derogatory evidence against him. It is known, for example, that the Army canceled a passport which the State Department had issued Condon to travel to the Soviet Union in 1945, and that the Army took steps to remove Condon from a plane which was bound for Russia.

Condon is now cleared by the Atomic Energy Commission for access to restricted data on atomic energy. We have not heard the last of the Condon case.

The administration of the Atomic Energy Commission with respect to this question of communism calls for a relentless examination which will not be forthcoming from this Truman administration.

There was no lack of warning against what has transpired in the administration of the AEC. When the United States Senate confirmed David Lilienthal as head of the AEC in April 1947, the question of Communist infiltration was thoroughly aired.

Nor has there been any lack of adequate rules to guide the AEC in removing all security risks from the personnel of atomic energy projects.

The official policy of the AEC with respect to security clearance for personnel is clear enough and adequate enough to keep any and all security risks far removed from atomic energy projects which are under the administration of the AEC. All that is needed is a strict adherence to, and application of this official policy.

All personnel connected in any way with atomic-energy projects fall into one or the other of two categories: (1) Those requiring security clearance and (2) those requiring security approval. Individuals who are employed directly by the AEC or who are permitted access to restricted data must receive security clearance. All individuals who are employed by contractors on work not involving access to restricted data must receive what is termed "security approval."

The official policy of the AEC underscores the subversive character of front organizations as no other governmental policy, decision, pronouncement, or verdict has ever underscored it. The AEC has emphatically linked the question of security risks with the question of membership in, identification with, or sympathetic association with organizations which have been designated as subversive by the Attorney General, or with organizations which have been otherwise established as fronts or known to be infiltrated with members of subversive groups.

The pertinent sections of the official AEC policy are worth quoting in full:

Category (A) includes those cases in which there are grounds sufficient to establish a reasonable belief that the individual or his spouse has held membership in or joined any organization which has been declared to be subversive by the Attorney General, provided the individual did not withdraw from such membership when the organization was so identified, or otherwise establish his rejection of its subversive aims; or, prior to the declaration by the Attorney General, participated in the activities of such an organization in a capacity where he should reasonably have had knowledge as to the subversive aims or purposes of the organization.

Category (B) includes those cases in which there are grounds sufficient to establish a reasonable belief that with respect to the individual or his spouse there is—

1. Sympathetic interest in totalitarian, Fascist, Communist, or other subversive political ideologies.

2. A sympathetic association established with members of the Communist Party; or with leading members of any organization which has been declared to be subversive by the Attorney General. (Ordinarily this would not include chance or casual meetings, nor contacts limited to normal business or official relations.)

3. Identification with an organization established as a front for otherwise subversive groups or interests when the personal views of the individual are sympathetic to or coincide with subversive lines;

4. Identification with an organization known to be infiltrated with members of subversive groups when there is also information as to other activities of the individual which establishes the probability that he may be a part of or sympathetic to the infiltrating element, or when he has personal views which are sympathetic to or coincide with subversive lines.

The AEC has explained that security clearance, as distinguished from security approval, would ordinarily be denied in both of the categories (A) and (B). On the other hand, security approval, while ordinarily denied in category (A), might be warranted in those types of derogatory information mentioned under category (B).

It is a shocking fact that, in the cases of many of the most eminent atomic scientists in the United States, there is a presumption of security risk, under any strict application of the foregoing principles of the AEC's official policy. Many of them have at one time or another joined organizations which have been declared subversive by the Attorney General, and many more have had sympathetic associations with leading members of organizations designated as subversive by the Attorney General.

One of the most important projects of the Atomic Energy Commission is the Brookhaven National Laboratory on Long Island.

Atomic scientist, W. A. Higinbotham, is a prominent member of the staff of the Brookhaven National Laboratory. Higinbotham has been chairman of the Federation of American Scientists, an organization heavily infiltrated with Communist fellow travelers. Ironically, the FAS has set up a scientists' loyalty committee, of which Higinbotham is chairman. This committee has among its members such veteran fellow travelers as Prof. Stuart Mudd, of the University of Pennsylvania, and Prof. Oswald Veblen, of the Institute for Advanced Study. Melber Phillips, secretary of the FAS, has an extensive record of fellow-traveling with Communist-front organizations.

Both W. A. Higinbotham and Melber Phillips supported the Win-the-Peace Conference which set up the National Committee To Win the Peace, the latter organization being cited as a Communist-front organization by the Attorney General. (See Daily Worker, March 5, 1946, p. 3.)

The subversive Win-the-Peace Conference was held in Washington, D. C., April 5-7, 1946. The meetings were held in the auditorium of the Department of Commerce, with the authorization of the Secretary of Commerce, Henry A. Wallace.

Cochairman of the Win-the-Peace Conference was Paul Robeson. Several years ago Robeson publicly expressed his preference for the Soviet Union as his homeland, for himself and his family. One of Robeson's recent anti-American performances took place in Paris in April 1949. At the Paris Congress for World Peace, an out-and-out Communist affair, Robeson declared that the Negroes of the United States would not fight to defend their country against the Soviet Union, a gross libel against the Negro people of America.

The sponsors of the Win-the-Peace Conference, with whom W. A. Higinbotham associated himself, included such notorious Communists and fellow travelers as the following: James E. Allen, Edward K. Barsky, John T. Bernard, Lewis A. Berne, Walter Bernstein, Dorothy Brewster, Harry Bridges, Louis E. Burnham, Benjamin J. Davis, Jr., Hugh DeLacy, Muriel Draper, W. E. B. Dubois, Julius Emspak, Howard Fast, Lion Feuchtwanger, Stephen H. Fritchman, William Gropper, Ralph Gundlach, Langston Hughes, Crockett Johnson, Kenneth Leslie, Albert Maltz, Saul Mills, Grant W. Oakes, Martin Popper, Ferdinand C. Smith, and Bernhard J. Stern.

Lyle Borst, atomic scientist, is also a member of the staff of Brookhaven National Laboratory on Long Island.

The Daily Worker of February 28, 1949, featured the announcement that Lyle Borst would address the Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace. The headline in the newspaper of the Communist Party read as follows: Atom scientist to address peace parley." In lending his name to the Communist gathering which was convened at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, March 25-27, 1949, Lyle Borst performed a distinct service for the enemies of the United States. The Waldorf-Astoria conference was held under the auspices of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions.

The Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities has published a lengthy special report on the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions, making it clear beyond the slightest doubt that Communists dominate the organization.

The Waldorf-Astoria meeting commanded the widest attention in the newspapers of the United States. Anti-Communist pickets were in line around the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel throughout the meeting. The speeches made at the gathering were, with a single notable exception, directed against the interests of the United States (the exception being the speech of Norman Cousins).

The panel on natural science at the Waldorf-Astoria meeting, scheduled to be addressed by Lyle Borst, of Brookhaven National Laboratory, was presided over by Philip Morrison, professor of physics at Cornell University.

Prof. Philip Morrison is a nuclear physicist who took part in the design and fabrication of the atomic bomb at Los Alamos Laboratory. (See Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, February 1949, p. 37.)

At the 1949 annual dinner of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship Professor Morrison was one of the principal speakers.

Parenthetically it should be noted that the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship has been listed as a subversive Communist-front organization by the Attorney General of the United States.

In his speech before this subversive group Professor Morrison did two significant things: (1) He hailed the Soviet possession of the atomic bomb as a boon to world peace. The clear implication of his words was that the United States has been the aggressor in the "cold war," and that fear of the Soviet atomic bomb would now make the United States more peacefully inclined. (2) He took occasion in his remarks to this Communist-front gathering, to berate the FBI. This was strictly according to the Communist Party line those days, and it pleased his audience immensely.

In view of Professor Morrison's record of affiliation with subversive organizations it is highly noteworthy that he is a member of the Committee on Secrecy and Clearance of the Federation of American Scientists. (See Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, April 1948, p. 111.)

Early this year the British physicist, Prof. P. M. S. Blackett, published in the United States his book, Fear, War, and the Bomb. Professor Blackett is well known for his pro-Soviet leanings. His book was extensively reviewed in the February 1949 issue of the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists. Prof. Edward A. Shils, of the University of Chicago, headed his review "Blackett's Apologia for the Soviet Position." The point to be noted here is that Prof. Philip Morrison's review of Blackett's book in the same publication was highly favorable, even enthusiastic.

Professor Morrison is no casual or accidental fellow traveler. He has been affiliated with the following Communist-front organizations:

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

1. American sponsoring committee, World Congress for Peace, member. (Program leaflet, April 20–23, 1949.)

2. Committee for Free Political Advocacy, signer. (Daily Worker, February 28, 1949, p. 9.)

3. Committee of One Thousand, signer of open letter. (Daily Worker, January 3, 1949, p. 7.)

4. Denunciation of the Hartley committee, signer. (UE News, January 1, 1949, p. 7.)

5. Educators for Wallace, member. (Pamphlet, October 1948.)

6. National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, speaker at annual dinner, September 1949.

7. National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, sponsor of the Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace, held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. (Program, March 25–27, 1949.)

8. National Non-Partisan Committee to Defend the Rights of the Twelve Communist Leaders, member. (Letterhead, September 9, 1949.

9. New York State Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, vice chairman. (Daily Worker, June 11, 1948, p. 2.)

10. Progressive Citizens of America, sponsor. (Program, October 25, 1947.)

11. Teachers' Union, Local 555, of the United Public Workers of America, supporter of Communist Samuel Wallach. (New York Times, November 12, 1948, p. 28.)

My next case is that of Harold C. Urey, professor of chemistry at the University of Chicago—that maverick among our educational institutions headed by the one-time boy prodigy, Robert Maynard Hutchins.

In discussing the record of Professor Urey, it should be borne in mind that the University of Chicago administers the Argonne National Laboratory on behalf of the Atomic Energy Commission. The Argonne National Laboratory is one of our most important atomic energy projects. It would be hard to imagine less-qualified persons than Professor Urey and Chancelor Hutchins for the administration of such a project—that is, from the security standpoint.

Prof. Harold C. Urey has achieved great distinction in the field of chemical science, having been awarded a Nobel prize for his discovery of heavy water. He was one of the leading scientists on the Manhattan project which produced the atomic bomb.

There is a completely fallacious view among us that a man who has achieved great distinction in one field should be listened to with respect whenever he chooses to speak upon all other questions. The obvious truth, of course, is that a scientist in the field of chemistry may be an utter fool in the field of politics and should not receive more attention on the latter subject than an eighth-grade pupil.

Of late, Professor Urey has been sounding off with bitter invectives against the security regulations which the Atomic Energy Commission has adopted and allegedly enforces for guarding the secrets of our atomic developments. Quite recently, Professor Urey declared that he would fire every security officer on all our atomic projects throughout the United States.

Professor Urey's temperament is anything but that of a cool, objective scientist. At times, he is highly emotional, even hysterical in his public speech.

Last December Professor Urey sounded off on the subject of a federal union of the so-called democracies. Such a union would, he declared, be "the first move toward one world." In the same speech, Professor Urey went out of his way to describe the revelations of Major Jordan as "this latest fool thing."

On May 19, 1949, Professor Urey appeared as a witness before a committee of the Illinois Legislature charged with the investigation of subversive activities at the University of Chicago and Roosevelt College. In his testimony, he assailed the Attorney General of the United States for issuing lists of subversive organizations. With emotion bordering on the psychopathic, he declared: "I consider the designation by the Attorney General of organizations as subversive or Communist one of the most dangerous things in American life." Professor Urey's viewpoint on this matter is diametrically opposed to the official viewpoint of the Atomic Energy Commission which holds, in its formal regulations at least, that the Attorney General's designations are useful—not dangerous—in reaching conclusions concerning personnel security risks. Furthermore, Professor Urey defended the granting of Government atomic energy scholarships to Communists, particularly the granting of a scholarship to Hans Freistadt, an avowed member of the Communist Party. "I consider it dangerous," declared Professor Urey heatedly, "to inquire into the political affairs of such students." It will alarm some Americans, at this stage in international relations, to find a professor of the scientific stature of Professor Urey supporting a policy of granting atomic-energy scholarships to Communist students.

In the case of Professor Urey, we find a possible explanation of his denunciation of the Attorney General's lists of subversive organizations. This explanation may lie in the fact that Professor Urey himself has in the past been affiliated with numerous Communist-front organizations, including five which have already been listed as subversive by the Attorney General.

And now this same Professor Urey wants to fire every security officer connected with our atomic energy projects. To him these security officers are just a part of a horrible witch-hunting scheme. It's too bad Professor Urey can't stick to his heavy water and let heavy politics alone. But, on the other hand, he has a right under our free institutions to be a first-rate political ignoramus.

Lest there be any misunderstanding of any kind in what I have said, let me emphasize that I have no information that Harold C. Urey is actually a member of the Communist Party. Like many non-Communists he has frequently collaborated with Communists to the great advantage of the latter.

Communist-front enterprises thrive on the enlistment of just such famous scientists as Urey.

The distressing fact is that Professor Urey talks out of both sides of his mouth. Out of the one side, he denounces the Communist Party unsparingly, as he did in his testimony before the committee of the Illinois State Legislature. Out of the other side, he defends the granting of Government atomic scholarships to avowed Communist Party members, denounces the Attorney General's list of subversive Communist-front organizations, and defends unblushingly his numerous affiliations with Communist fronts.

I come now to the well-nigh incredible account of one of our most prominent scientist's connections with the Communist movement.

This is the story of Prof. Linus Carl Pauling, who since 1931 has held a professorship of chemistry at the California Institute of Technology, and who is now the chairman of the division of chemistry and chemical engineering at the institute.

Pauling has valid claim to the highest academic and scientific distinctions. He was president of the American Chemical Society last year.

Having cited a portion of the academic and scientific record of Professor Pauling, I come now to his record of support for Communist causes.

Pauling was affiliated with the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born. Under the auspices of this Communist organization, Linus Pauling protested the deportation of Communist Hans Eisler. Hans Eisler was the Communist musician brother of Gerhart Eisler, both of whom are now out of the United States. Attorney General Tom Clark has listed the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born as a subversive Communist front.

During the month of September 1949 the Communists convened in Mexico City a gathering which they called the American Continental Congress of World Peace. Linus Carl Pauling was one of the vice presidents of this Mexico City gathering and also a delegate. (See Daily Worker, July 29, 1949, p. 5.) Associated with Professor Pauling in this subversive enterprise were such fellow-traveling stalwarts as Paul Robeson, Donald Henderson, Stefan Heym, Corliss Lamont, Thomas Mann, Vito Marcantonio, the Right Reverend Arthur W. Moulton, Harlow Shapley, Mary Van Kleeck, Henry A. Wallace, Colston E. Warne, James Waterman Wise, Thomas Woody, the Reverend John B. Thompson, and Gene Weltfish.

Linus Carl Pauling is a sponsor of the Committee for Free Political Advocacy. (See press release, February 11, 1949, and the Daily Worker, February 28, 1949, p. 9.) This is a Communist-front organization devoted to the defense of the 11 Communist Party leaders who have been convicted of conspiring to overthrow the Government.

On September 12, 1949, the Communists and fellow travelers who supported Henry A. Wallace in 1948 tendered their recent presidential candidate a dinner in New York City. Linus Carl Pauling was a sponsor of this affair. VITO MARCANTONIO was the principal speaker at this dinner for Henry A. Wallace. That should be comment enough.

In his biography in Who's Who in America, Linus Pauling inserted the information that he was on the board of directors of the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences and Professions and that he was the vice-chairman of the Hollywood Chapter of the ICCASP. The ICCASP was the immediate predecessor of the present-day National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions. The latter Communist-front organization was the one which held the notorious Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace, held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, March 25–27, 1949.

Linus Pauling is now the chairman of the Southern California Arts, Sciences, and Professions Council. This Communist front organization is the west coast regional branch of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, to which reference has been made. It is a provable fact that the great bulk of the Communist contingent in Hollywood is now associated with the Southern California Arts, Sciences, and Professions Council.

Pauling was a fellow of the National Research Council and also the holder of a Guggenheim fellowship. He is now a member of the committee of selection for the Guggenheim fellowships. It has long been known that scores of Guggenheim awards of fellowships have been made to Communists. This is not at all surprising in view of the fact that Linus Carl Pauling is a member of the committee of selection.

In the October 1949 term of the Supreme Court of the United States, a brief of amici curiae was submitted on behalf of John Howard Lawson and Dalton Trumbo, Hollywood Communists. Professor Linus Carl Pauling was one of the signers of this brief.

Attesting his prominence among atomic scientists is the fact that Professor Linus Carl Pauling is a member of the board of sponsors of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. (See issue of January 1949.)

Early this year, the largest scientific body in the world held its convention in New York City. I refer to the American Association for the Advancement of Science, often known as the Triple-A S.

As a final example of the Communist infiltration of the ranks of science, I am particularly interested in the fact that the Triple-A S elected Kirtley Fletcher Mather, professor of geology at Harvard University, to serve as its president in 1951. Mather's election is a sorry commentary on the patriotic sensibilities of American scientists. Mather has been known so long and so publicly as a supporter of the Communist-front movement in the United States that even scientists—however remote their ivory towers from political reality—could hardly have remained ignorant of his devotion to the cause of Stalin's fifth column in this country.

I do not mean to accuse the vast majority of these men of science of actually hating America and loving the Soviet Union. The strong probability is that the vast majority of the members of the Triple-A S are unorganized, apathetic, and indifferent to the machinations of a small clique which dominates the organization. Mather's choice cannot be understood on any other hypothesis than such a clique of Communist fellow travelers has great influence in this distinguished body. If this is so, it is time that the rank-and-file members of the Triple-A S got up on their hind legs at the next annual convention and prevented the installation of Professor Mather as the organization's president for 1951.

Kirtley Mather has been affiliated with upwards of 40 Communist-front organizations. Very few men in the academic world have a more flagrant record of supporting the causes of Stalin's fifth column in this country.

At the risk of boring you with a long list of names, I am going to read the organizations with which Professor Mather has been affiliated and which have been listed as subversive by the Attorney General of the United States. Here they are:

American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born.
American Council on Soviet Relations.
American League for Peace and Democracy.
American League Against War and Fascism.
American Slav Congress.
American Youth for Democracy.
Citizens Committee To Free Earl Browder.
Civil Rights Congress.
Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.
Council for Pan American Democracy.
International Labor Defense.
Jefferson School of Social Science.
Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee.
League of American Writers.
National Council of American-Soviet Friendship.
National Federation for Constitutional Liberties.
Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade.
Win-the-Peace Conference.

There you have 18 subversive Communist-front organizations with which Prof. Kirtley F. Mather has been affiliated. Every one of them has been cited as subversive by the Attorney General, which means that every one of them is an enemy of the United States. The Attorney General's listings are based on the most careful and exhaustive investigations by the FBI.

In addition to these 18 subversive organizations listed by the Attorney General, Professor Mather has been affiliated with more than a score of other Communist fronts listed by the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities.

What a record. I repeat that few professors in the whole United States have anything like it or even approaching it.

When the notorious Gerhart Eisler was indicted in February 1947, Professor Mather signed a statement denouncing "the shameful persecution of the German anti-Fascist refugee." The statement was published under the auspices of the Civil Rights Congress—one of the most malodorous of the present-day Communist-front organizations.

On April 19, 1949, the China Welfare Appeal was launched at a dinner attended by some 350 persons at the Hotel Roosevelt in New York City. The China Welfare Appeal is the American branch of the China Welfare Fund, whose chairman is Madam Sun Yat-sen, a vice chairman of the new Communist regime in China. There can be no doubt that both the China Welfare Fund and its American affiliate, the China Welfare Appeal, are operated in the exclusive interests of the Chinese Communists. Prof. Kirtley F. Mather is listed as a sponsor of these pro-Communist Chinese outfits. Paul Robeson is an honorary member of the China Welfare Fund. In this period of history when the United States has so much at stake in the Far East, it is shocking that any prominent American should line up on the side of the brutal Chinese Communist regime. It is doubly shocking that such an American should be elevated to the position of top leader of American scientists.

Professor Mather is particularly proud of one of his affiliations with the Communist-front movement. For 5 years he was national president of the American Association of Scientific Workers and wants that fact recorded. The AASW has been listed as subversive by the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities.

Let us look for a moment at the history and significance of the American Association of Scientific Workers. It was organized in 1938 as a part of a world-wide movement to enlist scientists in the cause of world communism. It was no accident that the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers, the British Association of Scientific Workers, and the Australian Association of Scientific Workers came into being within a period of 12 months in 1938 and 1939. Such organizations, bearing almost identical names in widely separated countries, had to have a central inspiration and direction. That central control was the world-wide Communist apparatus. Note carefully how these so-called scientific bodies were geared to Communist espionage as it was revealed in the case of the Canadian spy ring. I am going to read to you now from the Report of the Royal Commission, which was formed for the sole purpose of investigating Soviet espionage in Canada:

"Control by the Communist Party over a broad organization such as the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers could be used in a variety of ways not only for propaganda purposes but eventually as a base for recruiting adherents to that party from among scientists, and in due course, no doubt, for recruiting additional espionage agents in key positions in the national life."

Prof. Raymond Boyer, exposed as a member of the Canadian espionage ring, became the national president of the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers. The convicted Soviet spy, Prof. Alan Nunn May, was a member of the association's executive committee. Other members of the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers who were also members of the Soviet espionage ring included Ned Mazerall and David Shugar. Writing of another man involved in the Soviet espionage ring in Canada, the Report of the Royal Commission reported that he had become a member of the national executive committee of the association charged with maintaining liaison with corresponding organizations in other countries and that there was evidence suggesting that he used this position as a cover in making contacts with members of the staff of the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa.

It is difficult to understand why Professor Mather is so proud of his presidency of the American Association of Scientific Workers. The organization is a branch of the world-wide Communist movement, including the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers, which the record shows was nothing more than an espionage nucleus. Perhaps Professor Mather is completely indifferent to the implications of his affiliation, relying on the apathy of his scientific colleagues to shield him.

The American Association of Scientific Workers is an associate society of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. American scientists would be well advised to arouse themselves to the Communist infiltration of their ranks.

Spending the Nation Into Bankruptcy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, this Congress has authorized appropriations, contract authorizations and other expenditures, which indicate that the Federal Government is spending the Nation into bankruptcy.

During the second session of the Eighty-first Congress we have appropriated a total of $52,427,926,628.

In addition to the appropriations, the contract authorizations total $2,341,530,000. Permanent appropriations for such things as interest on the public debt, the Federal contribution to the civil-service retirement fund and other continuing obligations of the Government, will, in all probability, raise the total by another $6,000,000,000.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, we have appropriated and contemplate the spending of over $60,000,000,000 of Federal money in the next year.

Add to that $60,000,000,000 approximately $20,000,000,000 as the probable expenditures by State and local governments during 1951 and the total burden heaped on the shoulders of the American taxpayers becomes approximately $80,000,000,000 a year.

This means that approximately 35 percent of the national income is going for the expenses of government, with all the waste and hazardous foreign adventures included.

WE MUST CUT DOWN ON FOREIGN AID OR GO BROKE

Mr. Speaker, a large part of the spending in the next year will be for our adventures into the fertile fields of foreign aid, military assistance, and all the other schemes thought up by the economic internationalists to drain away the resources of our country in a global share-the-wealth plan.

The Office of Business Economics in the Department of Commerce reports that since the end of World War II, our net outflow of charity cash, goods, and services to June 30, 1950 amounts to $29,340,000,000. Besides the outflow already computed to June 30, 1950, there remains available for foreign aid in the form of grants and credits, a total of $14,146,000,000.

We are spending more each year on foreign aid and assistance than the total cost of the Federal Government in any single year up to 1933. The squandermania of the New Deal-Fair Deal party must be stopped by the people or our whole economy is destined for a collapse.

Let's cut out the foreign aid before we go broke. Next year may be too late.

The Kingsley Plan for Medical Manpower Distribution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, under permission to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of the Kingsley plan for medical manpower distribution. This proposal, prepared by Dr. D. W. Kingsley, a distinguished physician of Hastings, Nebr., is in my judgment worthy of the most serious consideration by the armed services as a means of conserving the services of our limited supply of doctors, dentists, and other medical personnel during this emergency.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE KINGSLEY PLAN FOR MEDICAL MANPOWER DISTRIBUTION

Medical manpower is one of our most important services for successful completion of any war effort. In time of war it also remains of prime importance to the civil population. In peace or war the same number of physicians will care for the same number of people. Only the conditions and method of service are altered under wartime service. Past experience in two great conflicts has demonstrated a wanton waste of our medical manpower. It is common knowledge that during World War II many eminently qualified physicians were assigned to such nonprofessional tasks as inspecting latrines and kitchens. Others spent long hours in routine office and administrative work which could well have been handled by trained office personnel. Still countless others spent valuable time in sheer idleness because of a lack of immediate need for their professional services. This loss cannot be calculated in dollars and cents nor in human suffering to our citizens. Such reckless waste is a luxury which even a country as fabulous in resources as the United States cannot afford in a time of crisis.

We are now facing a third catastrophic experience which, because of atomic potentialities, threatens to be of greater threat to total destruction. Shall we make the same great mistakes which can well be more costly than our previous ones, or shall we devise more efficient means to conserve our valued possessions? Is it necessary that we continue to waste valuable medical manpower in time of war simply because it has been traditional, or does both the medical profession and the military have greater responsibilities to our people? It is time for us to become more realistic in our planning in the light of modern medical care and modern transportation. It is not necessary that we continue to lavish valuable and unneeded medical service on noncombatant military groups at the expense of the civilian population. It is our patriotic duty to devise a modern plan to conserve our available supply.

It is the recognized duty of the medical profession to provide our people with the best possible medical care whether these people are in uniform defending our country or whether they be civilians engaged in normal pursuits in support of those defenders on the front line of democracy.

The Kingsley plan has been devised to provide sufficient and competent medical care to all Armed Forces based within the continental confines of the United States at a great manpower saving and to still provide the same competent service to the civilian population. Combat troops will retain their present T. O. This plan is respectfully presented through proper channels for consideration. The plan presented is broad in scope. There are many detail problems to be resolved.

Section 1: The medical care services of all Armed Forces bases located within a reasonable transportation distance of a medical center should be operated by the county medical society or other medical groups in that locality. The administrative work should be accomplished by Armed Forces personnel. The medical group operating the professional services may work out a plan of operation among its own members for the covering of the required services. This may mean a rotation of doctors in such a manner that the Armed Forces would be fully covered at all times and at the same time the civilian population will not suffer. Sanitation and other health problems will be assigned to personnel trained for that type of service. Doctors of medicine will devote their full time to caring for the sick.

It may be necessary to vary the method of operation to fit the needs of different bases. In all cases a medical officer assigned by the military shall be the Chief of Staff of the base hospital and the various services may be headed by competent local civilian physicians in the same manner as local civilian hospital units. Military bases located beyond a reasonable distance from a medical center capable of supplying a full complement of medical manpower may be partially staffed by the military from physicians disqualified for combat duty secured under section 2 of this plan. There seems to be no justifiable reason why every military base within the United States, and even some of the foreign bases, cannot be efficiently staffed and operated by civilian physicians and by inducted physicians disqualified for combat duty. It is immediately recognized that units in combat must be staffed by physicians qualified for combat duty and in a ratio at or near the present table of organization. It is as readily recognized that some definite change should be made in the present unrealistic table of organization for base units. The matter of compensation for services rendered could be on the same basis that the Veterans' Administration is using, or on any basis worked out between the Armed Forces and the medical governing bodies.

Section 2: Physical requirements for physicians should be based entirely on their capability to do professional work. A physician with an artificial limb, hernia, or impaired eyesight should not be rejected if he is capable of performing efficient professional services. There should be a place for him to serve his country under some of the suggestions outlined in section 1 of this plan.

Section 3: The Kingsley plan takes cognizance of the fine work and plans already formulated for the order of induction of physicians and heartily endorses the following order of induction as an aid to the plan:

A. Those individuals who received their medical education at the expense of the United States.

B. Those individuals who were in medical school during World War II at their own expense and who were deferred in order that they might complete their education.

C. Those individuals who have not served in either World War I or World War II.

D. Those individuals who have served in World War I and/or World War II. The order of calling these individuals should be in proportion to the time they have already served; i. e., an individual who has served 1 year should be called before the man who has served 2 years, etc.

Section 4—Summary: This plan is respectfully submitted as a workable answer to a serious crisis now facing the United States. Many perplexing problems must be resolved and details refined to furnish a completed vehicle. With this accomplishment the following results may be expected:

A. Fully utilize the professional skills required with a minimum of waste of medical manpower.

B. Provide efficient medical care for based troops and also provide adequate care for the civilian population.

C. Maintain sufficient civilian medical personnel to cope with atomic disaster in the vicinity of military and essential areas.

D. Make available more physicians for tactical military units.

E. Provide a great economic saving in the cost of medical care to the military. (It is estimated that the medical manpower requirements for the military may be lowered by 35 to 50 percent and yet maintain a high quality of service.)

F. Maintain high availability of medical care for the civilian population.

G. Place the responsibility for the health of the Armed Forces and the civilian population squarely upon those who are trained to accept such responsibility.

New Legislation Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, Congressman CLARENCE CANNON is to be commended for his splendid statement which appeared in the Appendix of the RECORD for September 27. To supplement that statement and the editorials which accompanied it, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the Appendix of the RECORD a series of newspaper articles and editorials based on the 1 month's experience we have had with the subversive-control bill. They prove that the passage of the bill was a serious error.

There being no objection, the articles in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of September 24, 1950]

NEW ANTI-REDS MEASURE MAY UNDERMINE SECURITY RATHER THAN BOLSTER IT

(By John F. Day)

WASHINGTON, September 23.—Not since the Alien and Sedition Acts has Congress been so willing, not to say anxious, to restrict personal liberties as it was in passing this week the McCarran-Wood-Mundt-Nixon-Ferguson-Lucas catch-all "internal security" bill.

That is the opinion not only of those who voted against the measure, but of a number of those who voted for it.

The Alien and Sedition Acts were a series of four laws enacted in 1798 by a Federalist Congress, designed to insure the defeat of the Jeffersonian Republican Party at the polls. The first three were aimed at denying a vote to alien Frenchmen who favored the Republicans. The fourth made it a high misdemeanor "unlawfully to combine and conspire" in order to oppose legal measures of the Government. Publication of "false or malicious" writing against the Nation, the President, or Congress was prohibited. The Federalists used the law solely to punish Republican editors who dared criticize the Government or the President. Federalists never were accused. The law finally was declared unconstitutional in 1882.

Furthermore, many fear the measure may actually weaken rather than strengthen our security against Communist sabotage and spying.

Then what happened? Why did Congress vote so overwhelmingly for the bill? That is an interesting story.

But first take a look at some of the faults that have been pointed out. Most of them have been overlooked in day-to-day reporting that the measure was essentially a "tough, anti-Communist bill" requiring that Communists and Communist-front organizations register and providing for internment of suspected Communists in event of invasion, insurrection, or a declaration of war.

CHANGES PERMANENT

Here are things the measure would do:

1. Make permanent—rather than for the originally proposed 3-year period—changes in our laws.

2. Require Communist and Communist-front organizations and their members to register with the Government or face heavy criminal penalties. At least three things have been called wrong with this:

First, that one might as well expect burglars to register and declare themselves.

Second, that Communists who refuse to register can fight their cases through the courts for years, and might well end up making martyrs of themselves if the Supreme Court—as many think it will do—eventually declares the law to be unconstitutional.

Third, perfectly innocent organizations which happen to be on the same side as the Communists at any given time may be declared Communist front.

In a final appeal against the bill, Senator KEFAUVER, Democrat, of Tennessee, declared: "I say that under this measure, anyone who forms any organization for any purpose, anyone who wishes to have intellectual liberty, anyone who does not wish to have conformity of political purpose, anyone who wishes to protect freedom of speech and freedom of the press, had better watch out. For in this measure are words and clauses which * * * could strike down things for which America has stood, for which our country has fought many wars, and for which we are fighting today."

NO CURB ON LISTS

3. Force every FBI undercover agent now working in a Communist or Communist-front organization to disclose his identity. This is one place where it is feared the measure would weaken security.

4. Force any person who registered as a member of a Communist-front organization to declare himself in effect as guilty of conspiring to overthrow the Government.

5. Fail to prevent Communist-controlled organizations turning in false lists of membership, thus requiring innocent people to spend years trying to clear their names.

6. Allow a corrupt Attorney General to refuse ever to clear the names of such innocent persons. Also allow a corrupt Democratic Attorney General to smear Republicans, and vice versa.

7. Make it unlawful for any person knowingly to combine, conspire, or agree with any other person to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment * * * of a totalitarian dictatorship. This is extremely broad terminology which could easily be stretched to the lengths of thought control. "Any act" could be making a soapbox speech or reading a book. One of the sponsors of the bill, Senator MCCARRAN, of Nevada, said that to admit belief in something was an overt act. And a newspaper which prints a Communist-line speech might substantially contribute to the establishment of a dictatorship.

DEPORTATION PROVIDED

8. Make it unlawful for any Government employee to transmit in any manner or by any means classified information (that which is marked secret, confidential, or restricted) to a representative of any foreign government or member of a Communist or Communist-front organization.

This section does not require that there be intent to harm the United States before a person can be penalized, and it includes friendly as well as unfriendly government representatives.

9. Provide for the deportation of any immigrant who has not been finally naturalized, who participates in any way in the printing or distributing of material advocating or teaching world communism or any other form of totalitarianism. That means that an alien printer or bookseller who has anything to do with Mein Kampf or the writings of Karl Marx can be deported.

10. Literally put a squad of immigration officials trailing every immigrant who steps off a boat in the United States.

11. Bar Communists and members of Communist-front organizations from working for the Government or in Defense Establishments. The trouble with this is that all sensitive projects—whether plants, airports, railroads, utilities, harbor installations, laboratories, or what-not—would have to be listed. This would form a perfect guidebook for spies and saboteurs. This, then, is another place where security would actually be weakened.

A NEW FIRST

12. Empower an Attorney General, under conditions not too difficult to meet, to stifle the emergence of any new political party.

13. In time of war or insurrection, allow the Attorney General to detain any person he has reasonable grounds to suspect may some day engage in espionage or sabotage. This concentration-camp feature was proposed by Senator KILGORE, Democrat, of West Virginia, as a substitute for the McCarran bill. When that move failed, it was put in as an amendment by Senator LUCAS, Democrat, of Illinois. In a queer twist, MCCARRAN argued that this section as originally written was too strong. And he removed from it a provision that suspects could be picked up not only in event of war, invasion, or insurrection, but at any time when an emergency was declared. Thus the part of the bill that gave real control over potential saboteurs was weakened.

14. For the first time in American history, make an act not of force or violence, or plainly leading to force of violence, conspiratorial against the Government of the United States.

Now for a little background on how this came about.

To be loudly anti-Communist—the louder the better—has become increasingly popular in recent months. Ever since the Alger Hiss and MCCARTHY episodes, there has been a sort of contest on in Washington to see who can damn the Communists the most vociferously. This, naturally, was intensified by the Korean War.

TREND WAS EVIDENT

Riding this crest of vocal anticommunism, Senators MUNDT, Republican, of South Dakota, and FERGUSON, Republican, of Michigan, began pushing vigorously for their Communist control bill. They were assisted in the House by Representatives WOOD, Democrat, of Georgia, and NIXON, Republican, of California, members of the Un-American Activities Committee.

Mindful that this sort of legislation could come to plague a party in future years (the alien and sedition laws destroyed the Federalist Party), President Truman urged Majority Leader LUCAS to keep it off the Senate floor. This LUCAS did for some time. But then MUNDT and FERGUSON began maneuvering to attach their bill as a rider to other legislation. And it was clearly evident that, the congressional state of mind being what it was, they were going to be successful.

Attorney General Howard McGrath realized that LUCAS and other Democrats were going to have a rough time being reelected if they bottled up an "anti-Communist" bill or got one thrown in over their heads. So he pleaded with Truman to offer his own proposals for strengthening the espionage and sabotage laws. This Truman finally did, but too late to stem the tide for the Mundt-Ferguson bill.

Senate Judiciary Chairman MCCARRAN, an antiadministration Democrat, sloughed off the Truman proposals. Instead, he accepted the Mundt-Ferguson measure, and added to it numerous other restrictions, including those on immigration which he failed to get into the Displaced Persons Act.

LUCAS MADE A SHIFT

Up until the very minute of the voting, LUCAS fought the McCarran bill with a vigor and courage that made his colleagues and newspapermen marvel. He was daring to run in Illinois against the "anti-Communist" tide. He sincerely believed the measure violated the Bill of Rights. He denounced it before the American Legion on the eve of final debate.

When the time for voting came, he offered the internment section (essentially the Kilgore bill) as a substitute for the McCarran measure. He got 29 votes. Then, without consulting those who had voted with him, and to their great chagrin, he moved to make his amendment a part of the McCarran measure instead of a substitute for it.

This pulled the rug from under such Senators as KILGORE, DOUGLAS of Illinois, and HUMPHREY, of Minnesota. In order to help out LUCAS and to get the part they had supported, they had to take it all, a bitter draught. Only seven Senators, among them KEFAUVER, stuck it to the bitter end and voted against the catch-all.

But LUCAS was not dismayed at what he had done. His attitude was one of "I guess we showed them who's really against Communists."

OVERRIDING CERTAIN

A similar measure, the Wood-Nixon, had passed the House by a whopping majority. The conferees kept the most drastic parts of both bills. The conference report went sailing through, 51–7, in the Senate, 312–20 in the House.

President Truman had not minced words in saying what he thought of the Mundt-Ferguson bill. And he told a press conference he thought the McCarran measure was worse. His lieutenants on Capitol Hill urged him not to veto, because of the political "heat," but veto he did.

Congressional overriding was a foregone conclusion.

[From the Portland (Maine) Press-Herald of September 25, 1950]

A SENATOR WEEPS

The sobbing of Senator PAUL DOUGLAS in the well of the United States Senate Saturday afternoon, after that body had overwhelmingly overridden the Truman veto of the anti-Communist bill was the very symbol of the feeling of men to whom thought control is the most obnoxious of the weapons of dictatorship.

For it is difficult to deny that the provisions of the act which is now the law of the land have within them plain machinery for punishing those who dare oppose, if only with their minds, the course upon which the United States has now or might later set its feet.

And yet, the Illinois Senator, who is one of the most intellectually honest men in government, well knew that whatever else the measure is, it is aimed at a party which not only plays a dirty game but makes up its own rules.

He more than once stated his dilemma on the floor of Congress. Though he stood with President Truman in Saturday's hectic session, he had previously recorded his vote in favor of the McCarran measure when it went to the joint committee. A sign of the grip the measure took on party lines came when another Senator from Illinois, SCOTT LUCAS, Truman's own congressional lieutenant, voted regretfully to override.

Here is the law: The Attorney General of the United States may intern possible spies in wartime, point the finger at any organization he thinks doing Reds' work, act as registrar for Communists and their groups which must declare themselves. Propaganda which is Red but doesn't say so is a crime. So is conspiring to substantially contribute to a United States totalitarian dictatorship or hiring a Communist to work for the Government. Red aliens may be kept out or deported and may not be naturalized. The statute of limitations on espionage is lengthened and certain acts, including those which led to recent strings of arrests for passing on atomic bomb information, are spelled out as spying.

Clearly, an Attorney General who was capricious, and we have been cursed with several, could soon make complete mockery of all civil liberties which, like so many great privileges of this democracy, are often taken too much for granted.

What does it mean to substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship? What is a substantial contribution? What, for that matter, is a totalitarian dictatorship? How easy to say, for example, that a political meeting which cheered loudly a forceful speaker who called an administration too conservative was making such a contribution. We know that while many meetings are held in good faith, many others sparked by Communists are not. The problem, calling for much more than the wisdom of Solomon, is to hit the Reds who have revolution in mind without hitting those who seek change through orderly means.

President Truman thought the second class is left unprotected by the bill he vetoed. The rest of us may only pray that the kind of soul-searching which beset honest Democrats and Republicans alike as to the veto fell will also prevail in the breasts of the men who administer the law. Where civil liberties have died, they have stayed dead a long time.

ON THE OTHER HAND—CURRENT CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGN PRESENTS UNEDIFYING SPECTACLE

(By Lowell Mellett)

It is just as well that the current congressional campaign can be concluded in less than 6 weeks. In one respect at least it is not a very edifying spectacle. Too many of the candidates are seeking reelection on a claim that does them no credit. The claim is that on the issue of communism they can be just as hysterical, or more so, than their opponents. Democrats, as well as Republicans, that is the appeal they are making to the voters. They are holding up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to prove that they voted for the Mundt-Ferguson-Nixon-McCarran-Wood bill, despite a 5,500-word Presidential veto begging them not to saddle the Government with legislation so unworkable and potentially dangerous.

The call these troubled days is for leadership in high places. One of the high places is Congress. Congressmen, Senators and Representatives, should be leaders. Their's the duty to think clearly in the people's behalf when the people themselves show signs of being confused; the duty to stand by their convictions when the mob spirit is abroad. Leaders should lead, not run away.

ATMOSPHERE OF PANIC

But the whole atmosphere surrounding the enactment of this 1950 version of an alien and sedition law was one of political panic. The people's leaders were running from the people, in the mistaken belief that the people had become an unruly, unreasoning mob and that the only way to appease this mob was to prove that you were just as scared, or even more scared, than the next fellow. That seemed to be the case with quite a number of the Senators and Representatives. In private conversation many admitted their grave misgivings concerning the legislation, but said they didn't dare oppose it, that to do so would mean defeat at the polls.

That's how it was with some of our statesmen. They simply closed their ears to reason and ran. Maybe they estimated correctly the popular state of mind in their home States or districts. They are presumed to know their own people. But they could be mistaken. Conceivably the majority of the people have no desire to see the Government strike out blindly in all directions, regardless of the consequences. The average citizen is capable of understanding the simple and compelling reasons that moved the President to veto the bill. Senator GREEN, of Rhode Island, has said that his mail was 10 to 1 against the legislation. This may be completely contrary to the experience of other lawmakers, but it does not excuse their votes if they voted in defiance of their own convictions. And many admit that they did.

MAY BE COMMITTED TO FOLLY

Living, as our democratic system does, by politics, it is unfortunate that politics so frequently brings out the worst in us. Never has it been more unfortunate than in the present instance.

Here we have a Congress whose members genuinely and wholeheartedly loathe communism, voting to put themselves in the wrong and the Communists in the right. Possibly, in a saner and more courageous mood following the election, they will find ways of undoing some of the damage they have done. On the other hand, the campaign being the sort that it is, they may commit themselves so deeply to their folly that it will be impossible for them to take corrective action.

Very certainly the Communist Party members, by the very act of resisting the new law, as they announce they will do, can be counted on to arouse a real mob spirit, one that will make any calm thinking almost out of the question. Which may cause the Mundts, Nixons, and McCarrans no regrets, but should sadden the better men in Congress who yielded their convictions to what they considered political necessity.

[From the New York Times of October 2, 1950]

THE ANTI-RED ACT AT WORK

The State Department, as Walter H. Waggoner reported to this newspaper yesterday, is having trouble with the new Internal Security Act. Section 22 of this interesting bit of legislation, as the President said in his veto message, "excludes from our country anyone who advocates any form of totalitarian or one-party government." So now the State Department, as Mr. Waggoner puts it, will apparently have to devise a political spectrum of the governments of the world for the purposes of deciding what governments are totalitarian and what are not. What about Spain? What about Argentina? What about Yugoslavia? What about diplomatic representatives, agents, and staffs from the admittedly Russian-style Communist countries? What about delegates from Red China, who may come here to present whatever case they have on the question of the alleged accidental bombing of their territory or the status of Formosa? What about Communist visitors of the nonconspiratorial sort—if there are such? We used to believe we might weaken any Communist's faith by showing him America. Has our own faith weakened?

Of course the State Department has to carry out the law as well as it can until or unless the Supreme Court says some of it is unconstitutional, or until and unless Congress revises it. Revision on the immigration and other fronts is suggested in the Statement issued yesterday by the 10 Democratic Senators who voted to sustain Mr. Truman's veto. They also make one other suggestion, which in an ironic way supports their opposition to some sections of the act. This is that opponents should take care not to join Communist-sponsored organizations which are urging repeal. Such organizations do exist and are making hay out of the present situation. Pretending to be liberal, they are working for the world's foulest example of illiberalism, as they always do. Now they have something new to talk about—a present handed them on a silver platter by 286 Representatives and 57 Senators.

Liberal opponents of the more foolish and restrictive clauses of this law are no more sympathetic with communism than are the rest of the population. They have a right to point, as the President did, to those sections which help communism instead of hurting it and hurt democracy instead of helping it.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post of October 7, 1950]

BARBED-WIRE FENCE

The barb-studded wires of the fence erected around the United States by the McCarran Act are now threatening to prick friend and foe, the dangerous and the innocuous, without discrimination. During the course of the debate on the measure, its proponents tended, ironically enough, to minimize its impact, while its opponents asserted that it would affect great numbers of aliens friendly, or at least not unfriendly, to the United States. Now that it has to be enforced, the State Department finds itself in desperate straits between the two interpretations. The language of the act affords little help. Indeed, it is language that challenges the intrepidity of lawyers and defies the understanding of laymen. Section 5 (c), for example, declares with characteristic lucidity that—

"Notwithstanding the provisions of the tenth proviso to section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended (39 Stat. 875; 8 U. S. C., 136), or any other law—(1) the provisions of section 1 (1) and 1 (3) shall be applicable to any alien within the purview of section 3 (1) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 153; 8 U. S. C. 201), except Ambassadors, public ministers," etc., etc., ad nauseam.

Well, as accurately as we can figure it out, the act will bar virtually all of the nationals and some of the official representatives of a number of totalitarian countries with which the United States is now collaborating in resistance to the spread of communism. It seems clear, as we pointed out when the McCarran bill was originally introduced and as the President asserted in his veto message, that the definition of totalitarianism laid down in the measure includes such countries as Spain, Portugal, Argentina, and Saudi Arabia. Any students or businessmen or tourists from those countries, if they adhere to the regime in power in their homeland, must be excluded. So far as they are concerned, then, we shall be as much an iron curtain country as the Soviet Union.

In addition, we think, there will be serious diplomatic difficulties under the act. Its restrictions do not apply to career diplomatic and consular officers who have been accredited by a foreign government recognized de jure by the United States and who are accepted by the President or the Secretary of State, and the members of the immediate families of such aliens. But many countries may wish to follow a practice commonly pursued by the United States and send over noncareer representatives for special purposes. None of these would be admissible under the terms of the act. If they are excluded, no doubt their homelands will counter by excluding comparable personnel from this country.

So far as the numerous United Nations organizations are concerned, the act permits admission only of a designated principal resident representative of a totalitarian government, accredited resident members of the staff of such representative, and members of his immediate family. A totalitarian government might reasonably wish to send to the United Nations General Assembly a nonresident representative—Mr. Vishinsky, for example—and the United Nations could scarcely function here if such representatives were excluded by the United States. Moreover, to exclude, as the act appears to do, the families of all members of the staff of a totalitarian representative to the UN would be to impose on them a senseless and altogether unjustifiable hardship.

How the State Department will adjust its regulations under the law to the demands of its sponsors on the one hand and the demands of common sense and international comity on the other remains to be seen. The McCarran Act poses, we think, an impossible problem. Time was when Americans had enough pride in their country and enough faith in the durability of their own institutions to believe that a visit here would make friends and influence people in our behalf. Now we present ourselves to the world as frightened and ashamed. Like Russia, we have transformed ourselves into a hermit state.

SUBVERSIVE CURB SEEN BLOW TO WEST GERMANS

(By J. Emlyn Williams)

FRANKFURT.—The new United States antisubversive legislation, which is primarily directed against Communists, may have serious repercussions here, according to officials in the United States branch of the Allied High Commission.

If maintained, the new law may react most unfavorably against the program for reeducating Germany in democracy, may hinder smooth working of plans for extending this country's trade with the United States, and inflict unnecessary hardships upon German wives of occupation personnel.

High Commissioner John J. McCoy is understood to have sent a request to Washington asking for further information and pointing out that strict liberal interpretation of this law could upset arrangements for sending Germans to the United States as part of the reeducation program.

APPLICATION OF MEASURES?

For the security measures which are now to be adopted would ban entry into the United States of any persons who were members of the Nazi Party or its affiliated organizations.

Does this include such organizations as the Hitler Youth and the League of German Girls?

This is one of the questions which must be cleared up. If they are banned, then 90 percent of the Germans over 15 years of age would be affected. Yet, it is from these very same young men and women that American educators over here aim to draw their democratic leaders of tomorrow.

POSSIBILITY OF GREAT HARM

To exclude people who at the time they joined such organizations were hardly able to discriminate for themselves and have since been trained along quite opposite lines is unjust. To exclude people who were members of the labor service, or even of the black shirt and brown shirt organizations would not show much understanding of conditions existing here in Germany after 1933.

Exclusion obviously cannot be made simply on the basis of membership in Nazi organizations. That would simply be introducing the grave mistake of the de-Nazification program of the first 4 years after the war. It would not only alienate the sympathy of the majority of good Germans but also undermine foundations of much valuable pioneering work which has been done here by American and German leaders.

There are today many hundreds of German students in the United States on scholarships and almost as many waiting to go. Presumably none of the former would be sent back. But it would be a serious mistake to reject entry to the latter because of something they did—or were compelled to do—in the earlier abnormal years of the Third Reich and in World War II.

German businessmen also would be affected. They have been encouraged to visit the United States so as to establish trade contacts and exchange commercial ideas. This has been done with a view to increasing the federal republic's foreign trade so that Germans can obtain more dollars and thereby relieve the American taxpayer of part of his burden.

Another class of people intimately concerned in what this new law means is the German wives of American occupation personnel over here. United States citizens who have married Germans and planned to return to the States with their new wives now believe that their wives will not be granted visas.

The United States High Commission officials at the moment are uncertain as to what this new law actually means in practice. For this reason the answer to Mr. McCloy's inquiry is eagerly awaited.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of October 10, 1950]

SECTION 22

By an application of his discretionary powers, the Attorney General has permitted the entry into this country of the young Austrian musician, Friedrich Gulda, who was technically barred under the terms of the new Security Act. When a child of 10, Gulda had been forced to join a Nazi youth movement; and section 22 of the act denies admission to aliens who have ever been affiliated with a Communist or other totalitarian organization. The exceptional permission is for a period of 6 days only, eliminating a second projected concert; obtaining it involved a bewildering and nerve-wracking delay at Ellis Island. The Government has sensibly announced that it will not press for the strict interpretation of the law which might have justified the holding of Toscanini on his arrival today, despite the noted musician's long opposition to fascism. Thus a bad situation has, for the moment, been dealt with in the best possible way.

Section 22 remains, however, a mischievous and potentially dangerous provision. In his veto message the President pointed out that, under its terms, Spanish businessmen or students would find it impossible to visit these shores, and that admission would be denied to those who had renounced and repudiated communism. Obviously, a law is not sound which relies upon a constant application of discretionary power—particularly when it is considered how many cases may fail to achieve special consideration. Since the act went into effect last Thursday, more than 75 aliens have been taken into custody at Ellis Island. What unjust hardships could be wrought on many of these by a rigid adherence to the letter of the act?

For a variety of reasons, neither the Congress nor the public was in a state to examine with sobriety all the complex provisions of the omnibus anti-Communist bill; and the President had forfeited the confidence which should have made his warnings bear weight. This newspaper pointed out the fallacies of the immigration and naturalization sections, where a host of novel and confusing barriers were added to the existing prohibition against known Communists. Congress is in recess; meanwhile the shortcomings in its work are spelled out. It can have no more pressing task when it returns than to review the results, applying itself to a law that really meets the threat of communism without raising up new problems and inviting new injustices.

[From the St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch of October 11, 1950]

CONFUSION AT THE GATES

American policy on the admission of aliens, especially those from former enemy countries, has been so confused in recent years that we doubt whether the State Department could make it worse. The Department, of course, has been accused of such a design by Michigan's Senator FERGUSON. He says it wants to discredit the new McCarran catch-all antisubversives law.

That law certainly does not make the admission of aliens, on a temporary or long-time basis, any easier. True, the Attorney General has authority to grant exceptions. But he must explain each such exception to Congress. That means, almost certainly, that there will be few exceptions made. It is easier to rule against a foreigner than to go before a congressional committee—perhaps for weeks of badgering. This shows, in a practical way, that President Truman was right in opposing the law.

Even without the law, however, the record on the admission of aliens is poor. Decisions have been all too arbitrary. The case of Ellen Knauff, the war bride, comes to mind at once. Or that of Josef Krips, the Austrian conductor, who was turned back at Ellis Island even though he had been given a visa in Vienna. Obviously, the gates should not be opened to spies and saboteurs. But they should not be kept closed because of some bureaucrat's unsupported opinion. And, as far as possible, the issue should not be confused by questions about the individual's personal or professional conduct.

Many Americans may not want to attend a concert by a musician who, in their opinion, did not take a sufficiently clear anti-Fascist stand during the war, or who, after the war, was willing to appear in a Moscow music hall. But if such a person has been given a visitor's visa, why not let him in? We can always express our disapproval by staying away.

Any other course on the part of the State Department, the Justice Department, or the immigration authorities at a port of entry can only lead to a long series of arbitrary and confusing precedents, many of which would conflict with American concepts of individual rights. Because it fosters such conflicts, the McCarran law is of the most doubtful constitutionality.

NEW SECURITY ACT STIRS CONFUSION FOR CAPITAL

(By Josephine Ripley)

WASHINGTON. — Immigration authorities here are frantically trying to unscramble the bewildering complications of the National Security Act, which has suddenly slammed the immigration door in the face of internationally famed musicians, foreign-born brides of American soldiers, returning immigrants of long United States residence, and has even barred ship captains and pursers from coming ashore for customary port formalities.

Stunned by the sweeping and confusing implications of the law in its initial application, officials estimate that it will cost some $12,000,000 a year to administer it and require the addition of 800 or more persons to the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Total Immigration Service expenditures in 1950 were $32,000,000.

TWOFOLD PROBLEM

Right now the authorities entrusted with the application of this law are tackling the Houdini-like stunt of trying to carry out its provisions and at the same time be practical and humane.

When the captain and purser of a foreign ship were recently barred from coming ashore, under one provision of the act, to attend to regular port business, harassed New York immigation officials appealed to Washington.

"Be sensible," they cried. "These men must get ashore."

Meanwhile, all members of the crew were also bottled up on the ship, with no shore leave.

In the case of the captain and purser, Washington immigration authorities gave permission to bring them ashore under a temporary visitor's visa, granted by the Attorney General in case of a temporary stay up to 6 months.

PROVISIONS OF ACT

In fact, this is the legal device under which the service is slowly relieving the Ellis Island blockade.

But that is not the solution, for here is what immigration authorities are up against:

The act says that among those to be excluded from admission to the United States are "aliens who are members of or affiliated with (1) the Communist Party of the United States; (2) any other totalitarian party of the United States; (3) the Communist Political Association; (4) the Communist or other totalitarian party of any State of the United States, or any foreign state, or of any political or geographical subdivision of any foreign state. * * *"

That includes anyone with present or past connection with any organizations of a totalitarian government.

APPLICATION TO ITALIANS

Such a provision could apply to nearly all Italians, since, until 1943, practically all Italian children belonged to the Fascist youth organizations. As one Italian put it when asked if he had ever been identified with such a group, "But, of course, one had to eat."

State Department brows are furrowed and slightly damp over the question of whether that section of the law could also apply to immigrants from Spain and Argentina.

President Perón is commonly called a dictator. The Justice Department will undoubtedly be confronted with the problem of deciding whether the Perón government and that of Generalissimo Francisco Franco shall be construed as "totalitarian" under the terms of this law.

One case which touched the sympathies of Washington immigration officials was that of an elderly Italian woman who had lived in the United States as an immigrant for many years. Not long ago she was called back to Italy by the illness of one of her children.

Now she is returning to her home in the United States, and because she once was associated with an Italian Fascist youth organization, she had to be stopped at Ellis Island.

She was finally admitted under a temporary visitors' permit, under which she may remain for 6 months.

Foreign-born brides of American soldiers who have been stationed in Italy, Germany, and other countries are also barred from residence under this legislation. These women are now being admitted under a temporary visitor's permit.

REPORT TO CONGRESS

While the act permits the Attorney General at his discretion to issue temporary visitors' permits to persons normally excluded under these regulations, it requires that he give a detailed report to Congress on all persons so admitted.

This poses a real problem. Immigration officials have no time to dig into the past of these people for the purposes of a detailed report.

It was solved this way: When the immigrants are questioned as to past affiliations, the immigration official immediately telephones the Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and Army Intelligence for a clearance or other report on these individuals.

Whatever these three agencies, or any of them, report is used as basis of the information for the detailed report required under the law.

[From the Chicago Sun-Times of October 15, 1950]

ANTI-RED LAW CREATES ALIEN CHAOS

WASHINGTON.—Harassed United States immigration officials struggled to cope with many-tongued confusion Saturday while the State Department sought to spell out regulations for executing the tough new antisubversives law.

The act bars from the United States aliens who have been a member of a Communist, Nazi, or Fascist organization.

ALIENS PILE UP

Aliens detained for a check-up under the statute piled up at Ellis Island, New York, and in Europe thousands of Germans, Italians, and Austrians clamored for clarification of the new American travel restrictions.

Overseas travel agencies reported scores of last-minute cancellations on plane and ship passage to this country. They complained their losses are running into thousands of dollars a day.

Here in Washington, under a massive portrait of President Truman, acting United States Immigration Commissioner A. R. Mackey sat at his desk in a drab, yellow-walled room overlooking the Anacostia River and tried to make order out of chaos.

CALL FOR GUIDANCE

On the desk, a battery of telephones jangled almost constantly, hour after hour, with incoming calls seeking guidance from points of entry on the borders.

Foreign governments vigorously protested the temporary detention of their nationals holding valid travel papers—including such notables as Victor de Sabata, conductor of the famed La Scala Opera in Italy, and Hans Hotter, German baritone, who came to sing at the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

De Sabata was released Friday after a 24-hour detention, but others were held longer while authorities checked whether they ever belonged to a totalitarian group.

On Wednesday the State Department announced a temporary world-wide "freeze" on all passport visas—except in cases where foreigners could prove to United States consular officials abroad they would be accepted on arrival in this country.

The order hit thousands of Europeans headed for the United States.

CHARGE SABOTAGE

Some Members of Congress charged the administration with attempting to sabotage the statute with a too literal enforcement policy. Congress passed the law over President Truman's veto in hectic closing hours of the last session. Now some lawmakers say the administration didn't want the law to work.

Foes of the law replied that it, not the administration, was to blame. They said the only remedy is drastic revision of the law.

Sitting in the center of this hubbub, Mackey declined to be drawn into the public disputes. In between never-ending phone calls, he told newsmen:

"We are trying to administer the law with all the fairness and equity we possibly can."

The week-long furor centered on that section of the new law which prohibits admission of any alien who has ever been a member of any totalitarian movement. That means Nazi and Fascist movements, as well as the Communists—although the much-amended law was originally aimed primarily at Communists.

Actually Attorney General McGrath has exercised his basic authority to grant temporary admissions in scores of special cases during the last week.

Altogether a total of 339 persons were detained up to Friday night. Of these, the Attorney General authorized a release of 170 under special permit, and the Justice Deparment is considering how to deal with the others.

Among those detained, and the new law's provision for their entry are:

Aliens who have lived in this country for at least 10 years and who are returning after a visit to the homeland—special-entry permits, good for 6 months.

IMMIGRANTS WAIT CHECK

New immigrant aliens—detention at the port of entry pending examination by a special board of inquiry.

The Government has not even made a start on another new provision which says that when the United States has ordered an alien deported and his home country won't take him back, there shall be no further immigration here from that country until the deportee is accepted.

Officials say the countries affected by this provision include nations with which the United States has the most cordial relations.

State Department experts, concerned with foreign relations, and Justice Department officials, who administer the law, are continuing a long huddle over next steps.

Meanwhile, with ships and planes arriving hourly at United States borders, many of the Immigration Service's headquarters staff here got notices to stay on the job throughout the week end.

LAW TO BAR SUBVERSIVES CAUSE OF MUCH CONFUSION—MANY ALIENS ARRIVING WITH GOOD VISAS FIND THEMSELVES SHUNTED TO ELLIS ISLAND

(By Jay Walz)

WASHINGTON, October 14.—The Ellis Island detention of some 100 incoming aliens this week gave the country a first view of the workings of its new internal security law, and Federal Government enforcement officials a first touch of the headache they were sure would come along.

Whether this initial mass screening operation actually shut out anyone dangerous was not immediately reported, as public attention was focused on the spectacle of a youthful Austrian pianist being held 48 hours, and of even Arturo Toscanini being subjected to a brief interrogation.

On the face of it, the proceedings looked silly and farcial to opponents of the legislation that Congress, just before its pre-election recess, passed over President Truman's veto. Supporters of the law reported the New York enforcement activity simply demonstrated that the administration intended, by overdoing it, to nullify a law it did not want.

NO ALTERNATIVE SEEN

The Justice Department insisted, however, that its Immigration Service had no alternative under the law to the action it took at Ellis Island. Section 22 of the law, officials quote, excludes from admission aliens who are, or have been, members of a Communist or other totalitarian organization.

There is one prospect, noted in Washington, that the congestion at Ellis Island may be relieved in the future. The State Department on Thursday ordered all visas except those of displaced persons withheld until the operation of the statute can be clarified. The Department also will assume eventually the task of screeing would-be incomers at its consulates in foreign lands.

FOREIGN POLICY DILEMMA

But immigration authorities will still be expected to be on guard and double-check on anyone they suspect. The Immigration Service also faces the problem of dealing with a retroactive feature of the law. This applies not only to aliens en route when the statute went into effect, but applies also to those already in this country. Those with totalitarian sympathies must be deported.

The State Department for its part is worrying over its instructions to its consuls abroad because important questions of foreign policy get involved. For example, if the State Department is to deny visas to totalitarians (Communists, or others), it must decide whether to continue to regard as dictatorships certain countries with whom the United States wants to be friends.

Enforcement of a much more controversial part—the Communist registration program—has gained momentum very slowly.

President Truman left for his Pacific rendezvous with General MacArthur without having named the five-member Subversive Activities Control Board, or having indicated when it would be named. This is the body that must rule after open hearings on what organizations are Communist, or fronts, and which, therefore, must register with the Attorney General.

TO PROCEED SLOWLY

The registration program is expected to move very slowly. A Justice Department lawyer said a hearing before the SACB to prove the Communist Party itself was subversive could go far beyond the New York trial of 11 Communist leaders that took 11 months. And, he predicted, until the existence of a Communist action organization (such as the Communist Party) were proved, it would be hard to show the existence of a Communist-front organization.

The Communist control law was passed on September 23, and the 30-day period provided for voluntary registration of Communists and their fronts is nearing an end. So far, none has offered to sign up, and none is expected to sign up. As a matter of fact, the official forms for doing so are still in preparation.

OUR OWN IRON CURTAIN FALLS WITH A CLANG

Before passage of the McCarran bill, with its hodge-podge of amendments, the United States had the most rigid and vexatious laws against the admission of alien visitors or prospective residents, of any country in the world save Russia and her satellites. Under the new law, we have at one bound reached parity with all the despised national fraternity of bolts and bars.

The degrading effect of the new bill in this one application alone may be seen in the piling up behind bars in Ellis Island of visitors and intending immigrants who had previously been cleared for entry under the old law. Now instructions to United States consuls abroad seem likely to delay indefinitely the arrivals of hundreds of foreigners, businessmen, artists, officials, and plain immigrants for further wearying investigation.

Under terms of the new law, any alien who holds or has held membership in, or been affiliated with, any Communist or other totalitarian organization must be refused admittance. The loose language of the section will mean an endless quibbling on the part of consular officials and would-be visitors, and a further spread of the already highly inconvenient division of authority between the State Department which processes intending visitors in their homelands and the Justice Department which questions them when they arrive here. Ironically the law's application so far has been invoked entirely against Italians and Germans, nearly all of whom must claim at least an affiliation with some totalitarian party in the past 20 years. Since no inhabitants of Communist countries dare apply for admission and no other admitted Communists ever get beyond the preliminary screening, the vast nuisance of this section accomplishes little, indeed, in protecting us from communism. It is likely, however, to put an abrupt stop to the parade of repentant Nazis, former Fascists, and loan-hungry representatives of Franco, most of whom at one time or other have had a cordial welcome from some Congressman or other. But this is not enough to justify it.

Unfortunately it must also abruptly halt the dreams or plans of scores of other decent Europeans who had hoped either to do business with us or maybe just to see how we lived and worked. For whether they have ever been affiliated with totalitarianism or not, and whatever the degree of their affiliation, the burden of proof is on them and the effort in most cases may be too great to justify the prize.

VISA ANTICS

The State Department, having suspended the issuance of all visas to enter the United States, is now engaged in the hopeless task of framing regulations to fit the McCarran Act. It must choose between making a mockery of the act and making the United States a subject of mockery throughout the civilized world. Apparently it attempted to take the first alternative as a lesser evil, judging from the assertion the other day by a Department spokesman that "a member of the Spanish Falange Party would get a visa as of now provided he is otherwise admissible." But the Department of Justice, demonstrating much more respect for the law, says it will not allow the Falangists to come in.

The McCarran Act explicitly forbids admission, or the granting of a visa, to "aliens who at any time, shall be or shall have been members of * * * the Communist or other totalitarian party of any State of the United States, of any foreign state, or of any political or geographical subdivision of any foreign state." And the act is perfectly plain about the meaning of the term "totalitarian." Here is what it says:

"The terms 'totalitarian dictatorship' and 'totalitarianism' mean and refer to systems of government not representative in fact, characterized by (A) the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial basis, with so close an identity between such party and its policies and the governmental policies of the country in which it exists, that the party and the government constitute an indistinguishable unit, and (B) the forcible suppression of all opposition to such party."

This is a precise description of the Falange Party in Spain. It is the only political party in the country, it is organized on a dictatorial basis, it is indistinguishable from the Government, and it forcibly suppresses all opposition. Therefore no one who has belonged to it or has been affiliated with it at any time, at least during the last decade since it came into power, can properly be admitted to the United States under the terms of the McCarran Act. The same may be said, of course, of anyone who is or was a member of the prevailing party in Portugal or Saudi Arabia or Yugoslavia. The same must be said, indeed, of anyone who was ever affiliated with the Fascist Party in Italy (about 75 percent of the country's present population) or with the Nazi Party in Germany. They are absolutely and unconditionally banned as permanent immigrants and may come in as temporary visitors only in special cases and upon specific authorization by the Attorney General.

No wonder, then, that Italian Ambassador Tarchiani delivered a formal protest to the State Department on Tuesday expressing amazement at the discriminatory character of the Department's interpretation of the McCarran Act. Italians who were only children under the Fascist regime over 5 years ago are being rigidly excluded, although the Italian Fascist Party is no longer in existence, while no objection was made under the Department's interpretation to admittance of present adult members of the existing Falange Party in Spain. Whether considered from the point of view of justice to aliens or of protection for the security of the United States, this is cockeyed nonsense.

But, of course, the whole of the McCarran Act's immigration section is cockeyed nonsense. The State Department, no doubt with tle best will in the world, has merely succeeded in making it slightly more nonsensical. It is not at liberty to exempt any totalitarians—even those dear to the heart of Senator PAT MCCARRAN. It must, like the Department of Justice, enforce this act to the letter until the absurdity of the patently noxious provisions becomes manifest to the Congress that adopted it. Congress alone can amend its own mandate. When it returns next month, it will take heed, we hope, of the sensible resolution passed on October 13 by the executive committee of the British Liberal Party: "The executive committee of the Liberal Party expresses its deep concern at the sudden suspension of visas for the United States arising out of the security law passed by Congress despite the President's veto. Freedom to travel is essential to greater unity between the free peoples, and such arbitrary restrictions upon it strike at the basis of the opposition to totalitarianism."

IMMIGRATION—REVENGE AT ELLIS ISLAND

Under the law some 347 Italian and German opera singers, businessmen, musicians, and plain citizens were snatched off ships and planes arriving last week in New York, and packed off behind the wire fences of Ellis Island. There they were 800 yards from the Statue of Liberty, and a good deal farther from the land they had hopefully come to see. They were among the first victims of the new restrictions on immigration in the Communist-control bill passed by the Congress over Harry Truman's veto. Italy was outraged; western Germany was hurt. Both sent protests to Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Harry Truman had warned Congress of just such trouble. Congress had ignored him, overridden his veto by humiliating majorities. Now Harry Truman was gleefully proving his point by enforcing the law to the letter.

The letter of the law did not give much choice. It banned any alien who "at any time" had been "affiliated" with any "section, branch, affiliate, or subdivision" of any "totalitarian party." Under Hitler, nearly every youth was forced to join one or another of the Hitler youth organizations; nearly every man who worked for a living had to belong to a Nazi-dominated labor union. In Italy, every school was a Fascist school. Officials estimated that the new law would exclude 90 percent of all Germans, more than half of all Italians. It would bar all repentant Communists, interfere with trade with Yugoslavia, exclude many of the 55,000 German refugees from east Europe, whose admission Congress had just authorized last June.

Republicans cried that Harry Truman was trying to discredit the whole law. The law provided, they pointed out, that the Attorney General might admit aliens temporarily at his own discretion. But the law also specified that he had to make a full report to Congress on each case every time he did so—and no Attorney General was likely to leave himself open to criticism when rigorous enforcement would save him the trouble.

Last week this policy was creating a very satisfactory uproar. As ship after ship steamed into New York harbor, immigration authorities seized one distinguished victim after another. There was Friedrich Gulda, a talented 20-year-old Austrian pianist who had come to give a concert in Carnegie Hall (Gulda had been required to join a Nazi youth group at the age of 10). Famed Conductor Victor de Sabata, who conducted at Tanglewood earlier this year and was coming again as guest conductor for the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, had conducted Milan's La Scala Orchestra during the Mussolini regime. A German war bride of Philadelphia, returning from a visit to her mother in Germany, was detained because she had belonged to a Hitler youth organization in her teens. The Metropolitan Opera's mezzo-soprano, Fedora Barbieri, was held (she went to a Fascist school).

The Metropolitan was also worried about one of its star sopranos, Ljuba Welitch. She probably joined the German labor front, observed Director Rudolf Bing sadly. "You either joined or you didn't sing," he explained. Arturo Toscanini was waved in though technically he too was suspicious; during Il Duce's regime, he had led an Italian orchestra, once ran for the Italian Senate with Mussolini on the Socialist ticket in 1919. Obviously the Attorney General felt he could make an exception of Toscanini.

Most visitors were admitted after a couple of days for a temporary stay. At week's end, with 131 aliens still in custody, the State Department stemmed the flood by canceling temporarily all United States visas all over the world. United States consulates were swamped with travelers trying to get a new visa under the new rules; many simply canceled passage. In Europe, the Communist press happily crowed about "American political racism" and referred to Ellis Island as "that well-known concentration camp."

There were other problems still unsettled. In Congress, Nevada's Senator MCCARRAN who sponsored the new immigration rules was the bright, particular friend of Spain's Franco; but weren't Spanish Falangists excluded by the act's language? Obviously they were, and presumably, if any turned up they could be hustled off to Ellis Island. And what of followers of the Dominican Republic's Dictator Trujillo, or of any of the other Latin-American good neighbors who had lived under military juntas and strong-man machines during the recent past?

State was considering making a distinction between nominal and undeniable totalitarian governments. No one had yet grappled with another provision of the law: a requirement that the Attorney General round up and deport all aliens now in the country who cannot qualify under the law. Throwing in the sponge, the Republican New York Herald Tribune admitted sadly: "This newspaper sees no alternative save to grant the President his revenge and insist on amendment of the worst features of the law as soon as the extra session reconvenes."

"Because of Our Strength We Can Hope That the Day of Peace Is Not Far Distant—A Day When Men Can Devote All Their Thoughts and Energy To Building a World Free of Fear and Free of Want"—Dr. John Steelman, Battle Report, Washington

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, this is the tenth of a series of weekly teledocumentaries spearheaded by John Steelman, assistant to the President over the coaxials and the television network of the National Broadcasting Co. This program, as you well know, is called Battle Report, Washington.

Mr. Speaker, nothing has happened in all the years that I have been a Representative to this Congress that has brought the Federal Government as close to the people of these United States as this series of telecasts now being made by the National Broadcasting Co. Time was when we regarded the radio as a powerful medium for the dissemination of general information, but through the medium of television, as made use of today by the National Broadcasting Co., in cooperation with the assistant to the President, Dr. Steelman, discovery has been made not alone of a new way in which the people will have greater knowledge of their Government, but also of a way in which the Government can be of greater service to its people.

It is a fact that our form of government would not be very effective were it not for the various mediums of communication which we now have and operate under a system of free enterprise.

It is in this manner that a more enlightened and better informed public can choose its representatives for political office at all levels of government—representatives who will, when elected, carry out the desires of their constituencies.

When society possessed only the medium of the newspaper and the magazine, the task of informing the public was indeed a slow one. Radio added tremendous impetus, but now, by virtue of the medium of television, an informed citizenship can not alone see but hear and know their governmental officials almost in person.

As a television program, Battle Report, Washington, is a sort of a pioneer project. Who knows but that the day is not far distant when these programs may seem crude? But they are definitely forward in their approach to our current political economy and truly representative government, and certainly are evoking greater popular interest and appeal at each succeeding presentation.

Mr. Speaker, much of the credit for the marvelous presentations, human interest stories, and popular appeal of Battle Report, Washington, is due to that great friend of many Members of this House, Mr. Ted Ayres, ace producer of the National Broadcasting Co. I know that I express the sentiments of the American people in general, and this House in particular, when I say that Ted Ayres is doing a splendid job and rendering a great service to the American people. The time and effort and skill that he puts forth in building and which is exhibited in this program can only result in a better America and a better government for our children and our children's children.

Mr. Speaker, during the past week the National Broadcasting Co. and its affiliates had a gathering at White Sulphur Springs in West Virginia. Mr. Robert McCormick, one of NBC's ace commentators, attended the convention, and in the course of one of the discussions presented to the gathering of NBC executives the transcript of an interview between himself and Dr. John Steelman. The interview dealt with Dr. Steelman's personal interest and participation in the NBC Sunday television program, Battle Report, Washington.

Because of that timely interview I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues in this House to extend my remarks and include therein this short interview and the ninth Battle Report, Washington, as projected over the television Sunday last. The interview of Dr. Steelman and the television script were as follows:

Mr. McCORMICK. Now, Mr. Steelman, that you have become so closely associated with television and Battle Report, Washington, won't you tell us about some of your reactions?

Dr. STEELMAN. Well, Bob, when Fred Wile first offered us time for a telecast, most of us knew little about the medium. Our entire knowledge had been acquired at the receiving end of the screen. But since the first program we have learned a lot, and now I feel certain that Battle Report, Washington, is doing a magnificent job in carrying these weekly messages into millions of homes. Through television, millions of persons not only can hear the message but they also can see the man who delivers it. I am confident that this is not alone making the public feel closer to the Federal Government, but is also increasing interest in public affairs.

Mr. McCORMICK. How about the production—does that interest you?

Dr. STEELMAN. Well, until I went into the control room during one of the telecasts I had no idea of what a complex production job it really is. In the studio I had seen you smiling as if no one had a care in the world and the cameras moving from place to place as if by magic. But in the control room I found Ted Ayers barking orders over the telephone almost continuously and meanwhile watching five television screens as well as the clock. But in spite of the tension, the program moves as smoothly as if it were as simple as falling off a log. It is a perfect example of perfect teamwork, with Ted Ayers in the quarterback spot.

Mr. McCORMICK. Dr. Steelman, have you heard about the new technical advances and how television is growing up?

Dr. STEELMAN. Yes, indeed, almost every day someone tells me of a new technical advance in television and I never cease to wonder. The most recent achievement of covering the President's trip to Wake Island seems almost incredible. The fact that these small hand cameras and sound equipment can bring us telecasts even from 20,000 feet in the air, as you did the other night, is something to really stagger the imagination.

You gentleman have earned profound respect for the great progress you are making in television. We are deeply appreciative of your generosity in making your facilities available to Battle Report, Washington, and I thank you. Best of luck at your convention—and look for us next Sunday afternoon.

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON, OCTOBER 15, 1950

Mr. McCORMICK. As the presidential plane, which left Washington this week to bear Harry Truman to point X, finally completes its rendezvous with General MacArthur at Wake Island, NBC television turns its cameras upon the Nation's capital to bring you some of the facts behind the vital talks that will take place on that Pacific coral reef this eighteenth week of war.

Washington, the city the President left behind on his blank-mile hop across the Pacific to discuss the battle for Korea, Korea where 350,000 United Nations troops are "moving in for the kill."

Yes, by land, by sea, by air the battle wages hotter. And that you may be more fully informed of what is transpiring now, and the outlook for the future, Battle Report speaks to you today through five Washington voices. The first, who will tell you more of the others to follow, the assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. Four hundred and fifty-eight years ago last Thursday, Christopher Columbus landed in the new world. The doors were opened for the civilization and culture of western Europe to flow into a new land and there to flourish. Fundamental in that civilization and culture was and still is our most precious possession—the rights of the individual. It is our heritage that governments and the men who compose them are servants of the people. People are not the servants of the government. That is tyranny.

Once again that fundamental of western civilization is being attacked. Vicious men, greedy for power, already have enslaved millions and, according to their own statements, are aiming to enslave the world. Their methods are obvious. First, they use promises. If they fail, the next step invariably is bloodshed, imprisonment, or death.

But freemen everywhere have risen up to resist the threat. We are becoming stronger each day—and because of our strngth we can hope that the day of peace is not far distant—a day when men can devote all their thoughts and energies to building a world free of fear and free of want.

This afternoon we will hear from another group of Government officials—the servants of the American people, who are working for the cause of peace in different spheres. The Secretary of the Navy, who faces a gigantic task in our world-wide defense program, will take us behind the scenes in the Pentagon. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget will discuss the fiscal problems of our Government. Our Minister to the Duchy of Luxemburg, who has just returned to Washington for consultation, will give us an intimate picture of life in western Europe, how the people look upon us and how they,too, are working for peace. A fighting major who has just returned from the battlefront will give us a graphic story of what our Armed Forces are doing in Korea.

One gracious lady of exceptional ability and three distinguished men are in the front line of the battle to preserve our freedom. After you have met them and heard their messages, I know you will join with me when I say: You are doing your part—and doing it well.

Mr. McCORMICK. Led by the giant guns of "Mighty Mo"—the famed battleship Missouri—this week end, 37 warships showed the Nation and the world what the Navy can do to stall aggression. Along 130 miles of North Korea's shore—practically to the very edge of Manchuria—they let the Reds have it. Big "Mo" alone raining more than 800,000 pounds of hot shells in a searing attack on the iron and steel port of Chongjin. This is but part of the vital work we can expect from our Navy today—operating through its battleships, destroyers, cruisers, carriers. But what of the tasks ahead for the Navy? For the answer to that question, here in our studios our NBC cameramen train their sights upon—Secretary of the Navy, Francis P. Matthews.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Fundamentally and traditionally, the mission of the United States Navy has been and still is to maintain the freedom of the seas for our fleets both combat and commercial, to deny their use to any enemy, and to keep war away from our shores. In other words the Navy's task is to carry the battle to the shores of the enemy and win wars through combat on sea and land far remote from our own country.

This was not only the mission of the Navy in the past but it is its task at present and its job of the future. The instruments for accomplishing these missions will change just as the sail was outmoded by steam and as in our own day the battleship has been supplanted as the core of the fleet by the airplane carrier.

We learned at Okinawa that a powerful fleet of our types of vessels is essential to victory over a foreign foe even though the enemy has no effective fleet of his own. That lesson has been repeated with much emphasis in the recent Korean incident.

Whatever the Navy's mission may be it is no more or less than the fullest contribution of one element of the national defense team dedicated to maintain our national security. The Army has performed a much more valiant and dangerous maneuver in Korea than most people understand or can comprehend. It will be on the job when the last shot is fired. It will have to stay to maintain peace and to help in the rehabilitation. That is the Army's traditional role in any conflict and it will be the same in any war of the future.

When the Navy's task is to support the Army its task is manifold. The Navy is responsible for the safe transport of our troops overseas. It is the Navy's responsibility to keep our expeditionary forces amply supplied with food, ammunition, medical supplies, and all other equipment that is needed to keep an army moving forward. In Korea as well as anywhere on earth where war rears its ugly head our battleships, carriers, and destroyers will support our ground forces and ground operations with pinpoint gunfire. Not only at Inchon but on the entire perimeter of Korea our warships made coastal highways and railways, troop concentrations and production plants useless to the Communist forces. The Navy is prepared to fulfill that mission in support of the Army wherever water is deep enough for the keels of our combat vessels.

In return, the Army has and will hold the bases and ports of entry our fleets need to command the overseas operations of the national defense team. In Korea the Air Force needed the Navy to transport fighter planes, every drop of aviation gasoline, gallons of oil, airplanes parts, and equipment that that gallant sister service needed in its vital task.

Thus, in the ground operation—and in whatever call to arms the future may bring—the Navy will be a full partner in the national defense team, each part of which is essential to the other two.

The Marine Corps, an essential and integrated part of the Navy, won new battle honors for our flag in the Korean engagements. As specialists in amphibious operations, as masters in the art of close ground combat, as well as excelling in the close air support of our ground troops, the Marine Corps proved itself at Masan and Inchon. Naval aviation, from the grotesque helicopter to the huge sleek neptunes, once again demonstrated in Korea the Navy's ability to carry out its assigned missions.

In all techniques of modern warfare the Navy has demonstrated its readiness. Whether we have enough of the instruments of warfare is a question which is being resolved. In the so-called mothball fleet, consisting of the Navy's reserve warships and lesser craft, we have a pool of resources which can be readily activated for any emergency.

As Admiral Sherman, the Chief of Naval Operations, has informed the Armed Services Committee of Congress our active fleet is in the process of being reinforced by scores of ships from this mothball fleet, after recommissioning and modernization. Carriers which were adequate for the demands of 1945 are being modernized to keep abreast of the advances in the science of war which our research of the last 5 years has produced.

Submarine warfare is one of the Navy's primary missions. This aspect of naval warfare is presently the No. 1 study of the United States Navy and I can assure you that devices are now emerging from the experimental stage which promises to return to antisubmarine warfare the advantages formerly held over surface ships by modern submarines. The results of our research in the modern marvels of electronics and the techniques of their unlimited application truly give us reason for optimism in our thinking.

The day of great surface fleet engagements is probably something of the past. We will probably never hear again about rival floating fortresses slamming away at each other as at Surigao Straits in World War II. There is no potential enemy who has the naval forces to match or even approach ours in types and numbers, nevertheless, we will need all that the Navy can afford to keep afloat, from carriers to landing craft, to insure the speediest and most effective response to any threat against our security or the peace of the world wherever it may appear on the globe.

With our fleets in the Pacific, the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, the potential spots of eruption are all within relatively few hours of punitive action by our Navy.

Therefore, I say, that the effective protection of American lives, of American territory and of the lives and territory of our allies is the major mission of the United States Navy. The cost of meeting this responsibility may be high in dollars but it will be low in comparison with the value received. The Navy has the capability to fulfill its historical mission of keeping the horrors of war from our own shores. With the Army and the Air Force it is dedicated to defend your liberty and the sacred right of free men to live in happiness and peace in a free world.

Mr. McCORMICK. King Football is with us once again, and with him, the excitement of passing and broken-field running, the frenzied roar of the crowd, the thrill of upsets, but the only upets aren't on the gridiron, America. Behind the men meeting Communist aggression in Korea, behind the mountain of supplies that feed their strength lies another kind of upset, far more important to most of you, believe me, than Purdue's 28 over Notre Dame's 14. Here with a "play-by-play" description of the impact of war in Korea upon the Nation's budget, hence upon every pay envelope in these United States, here is the Nation's "finance quarterback," the Director of the Budget, Fred Lawton.

Mr. LAWTON. The action of the United States in world affairs is a major factor in determining the size of the Federal budget. Events of the past 4 months have amply demonstrated this fact. Since the attack in Korea, we have more than doubled the $14,000,000,000 originally planned for military purposes in this fiscal year. We are going to have to increase the amount still further. By next year, well over half of the budget will be devoted to defense.

These increased military expenditures are going to require a good deal of the manpower and materials we have been using to produce civilian goods. Consequently, it has been necessary to take measures which will help raise our total production and keep our mounting defense spending from causing inflation. The people producing military equipment are getting more dollars in their pay envelopes, but there is no increase in the amount of goods they can buy. These added dollars increase the competition for the available goods and push prices up. Furthermore, unless we can halt inflation, we shall be spending more dollars for defense without getting our money's worth. Our dollars would be going for increased prices rather than for more defense.

So far we have attacked the problems on four fronts:

First, Congress passed the Defense Production Act early in September. Under this act Federal agencies are taking steps to conserve materials, give priority to defense contracts, and stimulate capacity for expansion in critical industries.

Second, steps have been taken to reduce the volume of new credit in both the housing and consumer credit fields. This helps to relieve the upward pressure on prices.

Third, a tight rein was held on nonmilitary expenditures in this year's budget. Since Korea, it has been pulled even tighter. Congress directed the executive branch to cut at least $550,000,000 from the funds it voted in the general appropriation act. Last week I announced the reductions which had been applied to 31 departments and agencies in the 1951 fiscal year. The total amounted to more than $580,000,000. Congress directed that this cut-back should be made without impairing national defense. We have made the saving serve two additional purposes. It will conserve materials and manpower needed for defense, and it will reduce the inflationary effects of lending programs.

Fourth, Congress has passed a tax measure which the President calls the first installment. This is expected to bring in about $4,500,000,000 a year. The best way to support our defense expenditures—and check inflation—is to increase taxes. While taxes hit the pocketbooks of all of us, they divide the cost of the defense program more fairly than inflation, which hurts those with low or fixed incomes the most.

We must spread the burden fairly because our Government expenditures will have to be very high for years to come.

Mr. McCORMICK. Far beyond the thirty-eighth parallel—in some places as much as 100 miles deep—ranges the United Nations fast-rolling military machine. Wonson is ours. And relentlessly our troops are advancing on Pyongyang, the North Korean capital—fresh back from Korea, where he has been with our armed forces virtually from the moment war began, comes our next guest. A combat infantryman in the last war—in this, his job has been to gather the news for our Defense Department. He is prepared to report to us specifically on the cost of war as he has seen it—and also, tell us something of the problems of our war correspondents, who are engaged in perhaps one of the most difficult reportorial assignments in history. Ladies and gentlemen—meet military correspondent Maj. Wes McPherson.

Major McPHERSON. Yes, warfare is an expensive business. And this thing in Korea has been no exception. But that's part of the price we must pay for freedom. It takes lots of guns, ammunition and tanks to take a hill. And in Korea there's an expression: "over the hills, more hills." I've seen the toll that must be paid to win a hill in Korea.

The American people probably pay more in dollars and cents for a battle won than any people in the world. But because they do, the cost in lives is smaller. But I think this is common knowledge to most Americans who have been following the struggle in Korea in their newspapers, on radio and television—following it from the on-the-scene reports obtained by the war correspondents there.

Less familiar, however, has been the story of the correspondents themselves—or the story behind the story. The correspondents in Korea have a higher rate of casualties than in any past conflict. And their ratio of killed to wounded-and-missing has been even greater than among the combat infantrymen—more than 50 percent of all correspondent casualties have been fatal.

The nature of the warfare in Korea and the enemy there has made the area behind the lines almost as dangerous as the front. Actually, it has become well established that the area of greatest danger has not always been on the front line, but frequently between the command posts and the front line. There where infiltrating enemy patrols and snipers often moved 24 hours a day, to travel except in strong groups was almost the kiss of death. The correspondents, because they had to travel fast, had to travel alone. They were seldom able to wait for convoys or organized groups for protection.

Let me cite from my own experience some examples typical of the risks correspondents had to take, not only to get the story, but to bring it back. One day, on the front, below Taegu, several correspondents and I had completed a recording of an action and were ready to return to the air strip at Taegu to take a plane back to Tokyo where I had to make my short-wave broadcast to the States. It was then that we learned that the road over which we had traveled to reach the forward position had been cut by an enemy patrol of unknown size. Some of our troops were attacking to clear the road which was a vital battle supply route. We waited an hour, maybe a little more. The enemy had been driven back into the hills but was still able to deliver fire on the road. Then we could wait no longer; we all had a deadline to make. We jumped in a jeep that was going to make a run for it and almost immediately came under an observation and fire from the enemy in the hills which continued for more than a mile. By some miracle of good fortune none of us were hit. We reached the airfield and I got back to Tokyo and made my broadcast deadline that midnight for our official Department of Defense radio program, Time for Defense.

Another time I joined a group of our own Army Signal Corps, still a motion-picture cameraman, at a forward artillery observation post to record the story of a duel between that observation post and enemy tanks and artillery. To reach that position, which was on a newly captured hill, we had to race down a mile and a half of straight road under direct observation of enemy artillery and tanks. To make our deadlines we had to use the same road going out again. Good fortune was with us and we made it. These are typical examples of the risks that correspondents have run to bridge the gap between people at home and the soldier at the front with the gun. Some made it—but some didn't. Such incidents as I've cited have become a matter of normal daily routine for the correspondents in Korea—men like Hal Boyle, Don Whitehead, your NBC camermen Gene and Charlie Jones, and yes, even a woman too—Marguerite Higgins. So, taking advantage of this opportunity, I'd like to say, "Well done" and "continued good luck" to these representatives of our country's great news gathering organizations. They're part of a fine profession which can be justly proud of the work they've been doing in Korea.

Mr. McCORMICK. Europe—as if reminding us it is still there—flares again. In Austria, where the news features Communist-inspired rioting, in Germany, and in similar tinder-boxes throughout the Continent, the signs of unrest are unmistakable. Let us, then, take our eyes off Korea for a moment and—for a first-hand report on Europe—put them on one of America's best-liked ministers abroad. With Presidential Assistant Dr. Steelman standing by to interview her in your behalf—here, in her first television appearance since her return to this country, is the United States Minister to Luxemburg, Mrs. Pearl Mesta.

Dr. STEELMAN. Madam Minister, it's nice to see you again, and even nicer to have you with us on this program. We will be very glad to hear your reactions on what has been happening in Europe. Specifically, how did the people of Europe take the news of the invasion of South Korea?

Mrs. MESTA. I think the Europeans reacted almost the same as we Americans. They were very disturbed—perhaps more disturbed than we were at home, since they are such a short distance from the Russian zone. However, there was no panic, and everyone was vastly relieved at the prompt action of the United Nations.

Dr. STEELMAN. Has this initial reaction changed in any respect, Madam Minister?

Mrs. MESTA. No, except that opposition to aggression has become firmer than ever. The Europeans realize as we do that a strong stand is the only course to follow in the present situation. I think almost everyone in Europe realizes now that they must make a strenuous effort if the free world is to remain free, and they are prepared to do their part.

Dr. STEELMAN. How do people in Europe feel today about the United Nations?

Mrs. MESTA. There can be no doubt that the prestige of the United Nations has risen immeasurably in Europe since the very prompt and effective United Nations action in Korea. I think that before that there were certain misgivings—some people were prone to look back to the days of the League of Nations and feel that the UN might go the way of the League. They were afraid that a Russian veto would effectively immobilize the UN were rapid action necessary to settle a crisis in some distant corner of the world. But the way in which the United Nations acted in the Korean invasion and the excellent results obtained, have done a great deal to renew peoples' faith. They have regained their confidence in the United Nations and feel, once again, that there might be some way to find peace through international organization. And I might add they are heartily grateful and thankful to the United States for the way our American boys have fought in Korea.

Dr. STEELMAN. I wonder, Madam Minister, if you could give us some of your reactions about the United States? Sometimes it is difficult for those of us who don't travel to see any marked changes; whereas an observant person coming home after living abroad for sometime can readily see very distinct changes.

Mrs. MESTA. Mr. Steelman, one of the first things I noticed and which, I might say, gave a tug at my heart strings, was a line of young men in Union Station in Washington, under the care of a Marine sergeant, bound for training camp. It is sad to see our young men going back into uniform. I have also felt an air of determination, coupled with a feeling of urgency, when I have discussed recent developments with my friends. They are determined to see this thing through and believe that we must strengthen our defenses as promptly as possible. They feel that the fate of the world hangs upon the forceful action the free nations take during the months ahead and they hope and pray that through effective united action a lasting peace can be secured. I might add a note of caution to what I have just said. I have been asked by several Europeans if the end of the war in Korea would mean that the United States defense effort would be slowed down. Of course, what they were driving at was that if we didn't propose to continue strengthening our defenses they would not continue strengthening theirs. To this, my reply has been that the United States does not intend to slow down. On the contrary, we are going to step up our defense production and they must do likewise.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Thus the Nation, America—as representatives of the Nation on the Army, Navy, and Diplomatic front have come before our cameras to report to you—looks from Washington this mid-October Sunday.

Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another "Teledocumentary"—this, then, against the background of battle-front Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your tenth "Battle Report, Washington."

Summary of Legislation of Committee on Banking and Currency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith submit a summary of the legislation to date acted upon by the Committee on Banking and Currency during the second session of this the Eighty-first Congress. The legislation affects many phases of our national economy, and after the Korean outbreak the committee devoted its efforts to measures designed to conserve our resources, channel our productive capacity into necessary defense production, and stabilize our economy against inflation in order to promote the national defense and security.

For easy reading and continuity of subject matter, the legislation has been grouped under general headings, and subjects dealing with those general headings are summarized thereunder. For the further convenience of the Members, the public law number and the House report numbers, including conference reports, are listed immediately under the heading of each measure for ready reference to more detailed descriptions and analyses of the matter concerned. For the further information of the Members, I would like to call their attention to the fact that the summary of the committee's activities during the first session of this Congress may be found in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 16, beginning at page A6790.

All but three of the measures acted upon by the Committee on Banking and Currency have been enacted into law. Of these three, two have passed the House and are pending in the Senate and the other is pending before the House Committee on Rules.

The summary follows:

ECONOMIC MEASURES

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

(Public Law 774; H. Repts. Nos. 2759 and 3042)

This law, which was enacted after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, provides broad authorities for mobilizing materials for the defense program and for protection of the civilian economy.

The President is authorized to require priority for national defense contracts and to allocate necessary materials and facilities. It is made unlawful to hoard materials designated by the President as scarce materials. Equipment and materials needed for the national defense may be requisitioned by the President and provision is made for payment of just compensation.

The President may authorize Government procurement agencies to guarantee financing institutions against loss on loans made to finance national defense contracts. To expedite production for national defense the President is authorized to make or guarantee loans for expansion of capacity, development of technological processes or production of essential materials. Further encouragement to needed production is contained in procurement authority granted the President to purchase or make commitments to purchase metals, minerals, and other raw materials for Government use or resale. Two billion dollars is authorized for the loan and purchase authorities.

To prevent economic disturbances and interferences with effective mobilization of national resources, the President is authorized to undertake price and wage stabilization on a voluntary, selective or over-all control basis. Voluntary control programs approved by the President are exempted from antitrust laws. In the event selective price controls are imposed, wages must be stabilized in the particular industry producing such material or service. Over-all price controls and wage stabilization are required whenever ceilings have been established on a substantial part of all sales at retail and materially affecting the cost of living.

In the settlement of labor disputes affecting national defense, primary reliance is placed upon mediation and conciliation through negotiation and collective-bargaining processes. To this end, the President may initiate voluntary conferences between management, labor, and designated representatives of the Government and the public, and take action agreed upon in such conference.

Authority is granted for regulation of consumer and real-estate construction credit to conserve resources for defense needs and to help control inflation. The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System is authorized to exercise consumer credit controls and the President is authorized to prescribe regulations preventing excessive or untimely use of real-estate construction credit. He is further authorized to curtail real-estate loans made, insured, or guaranteed by United States Government agencies, but in doing so must preserve the relative credit preferences accorded veterans under existing law.

Provision is made for encouragement of small business enterprises to make the greatest possible contribution toward achieving the objectives of the act through use of advisory committees, full dissemination of information, exemptions when feasible, and expeditious handling of requests, applications, and appeals.

TEXAS CITY TIN SMELTER

(Public Law 723; H. Repts. Nos. 2270 and 2911)

This act provides a 5-year extension (to June 30, 1956) in the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (1) to buy, sell, and transport tin, and tin ore and concentrates; (2) to improve, develop, maintain, and operate by lease or otherwise the Government owned tin smelter at Texas City, Tex.; and (3) to finance research in tin smelting and processing.

The Texas City Tin Smelter is the only tin smelter in the Western Hemisphere. Its production of this critical material was of major importance to the defense needs of the country in World War II and in the ensuing years. The smelter has facilities to treat the entire Bolivian ore production, which would provide for approximately two-thirds of United States consumption under strict wartime controls. The 5-year extension in authority for operation of this facility will provide needed flexibility in making contracts with foreign countries and producers for ore supplies.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK FOREIGN INVESTMENT GUARANTIES

(H. R. 8083; H. Rept. No. 1960)

Late last year the committee favorably reported H. R. 5594, a bill which would vest in the Export-Import Bank of Washington the power to guarantee United States investments abroad. This was designed to implement a part of the President's point 4 program to assist underdeveloped areas of the world to improve the economic status of their peoples. The proposed guaranty authority would not permit guaranties covering ordinary business risks, but would only relate to losses due to inconvertibility of currencies or losses due to expropriation, confiscation, or seizure by action of public authority. It was felt that protection against these risks peculiar to foreign investment would stimulate the flow of American private capital to the underdeveloped areas of the world.

In this session of Congress, the committee reported a substitute bill, H. R. 8083, which dealt with the same subject matter as the previously reported bill but differed in two particulars in that specific provision was made for the charging of an appropriate fee for guaranties issued and the aggregate amount of such guaranties was limited to $250,000,000 outstanding at any one time. As the bill passed the House, provision was further made requiring that there be in effect between the foreign country and the United States a treaty or agreement adequately protecting nationals of the United States against discriminatory action by the foreign country.

BANKING, CREDIT, AND FINANCE

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE ACT

(Public Law 797; H. Repts. Nos. 2564 and 3049)

This act increases the insurance coverage on individual deposits in banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation from $5,000 to $10,000. It provides a reduction in the cost of deposit insurance to insured banks by making provision for a credit to the banks of a percentage of the net assessment paid each year. This premium-credit formula, while providing for a reduction in the assessments paid by the banks, at the same time adequately protects the FDIC insurance reserves because the premium credit only becomes available when current assessments received by the FDIC are adequate to pay operating expenses and losses. The banks receive a credit of 60 percent of net assessment income and the remaining 40 percent goes into the FDIC insurance reserves.

This act also requires the FDIC to repay to the Treasury prior to July 1, 1951, approximately $60,000,000, which represents simple interest on the capital funds originally advanced to the FDIC by the Treasury and Federal Reserve banks, which capital funds of some $289,000,000 have already been repaid to the Treasury. This act also provides for simplification in the computation of the assessment base, and gives the FDIC under certain conditions the authority to make special examination of all insured banks. The act also contains other amendments of a technical nature designed to strengthen the Federal deposit-insurance law.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS DIRECT-PURCHASE AUTHORITY

(Public Law 589; H. Rept. No. 2359)

This act extends the authority of the 12 Federal Reserve banks to purchase directly from the Treasury Government obligations up to $5,000,000,000. This direct-purchase authority would have expired June 30, 1950, and this act extended the authority for an additional 2 years to June 30, 1952. This authority assists in the management of the Government's finances in such a way as to promote the stability and good health of the Nation's economy rather than subjecting it to periodic strains. Without this authority, the Treasury would have to maintain larger cash balances which would, of course, increase interest costs to the Government.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK SYSTEM AND FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION

(Public Law 576; H. Rept. No. 1540)

This act makes several important changes in the operation of the Federal Home Loan Bank System which serves as a permanent reservoir of credit for thrift and home-financing institutions such as savings and loan associations, building and loan associations, cooperative banks, homestead associations, and savings banks. It also makes important changes in the law governing the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation which insures savings accounts in Federal Savings and Loan Associations and those State-chartered institutions which are members of the Corporation.

With respect to the Federal Home Loan Bank System, the act:

1. Provides for acceleration of the retirement of Government-owned capital in the Federal home-loan banks. All such stock will be retired within 3 years.

2. Provides a statutory range of minimum liquidity requirements for members of any Federal home-loan bank.

3. Provides standby Treasury support of the Federal home-loan banks through purchase of their obligations up to an amount of $1,000,000,000 outstanding at any one time. Such Treasury support would only be used in event of an emergency and is similar to Government support provided to other financial agencies of the Government.

With respect to the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, the act:

1. Increases the maximum insurance of individual accounts in insured savings and loan associations and building and loan associations from $5,000 to $10,000.

2. Provides for an orderly retirement of the Government-owned capital stock of the Corporation.

3. Provides for a reduction in the insurance premium rate from one-eighth to one-twelfth of 1 percent.

4. Authorizes the Corporation to borrow from the Treasury for insurance purposes up to $750,000,000.

The institutions that are members of the Federal Home Loan Bank System and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation play an important part in our economy. They promote and encourage thrift and systematic savings, and at the same time meet a most important need in the home financing requirements of their communities.

PUBLIC DEPOSITS IN NATIONAL BANKS

(Public Law 715; H. Rept. No. 2271)

This act would permit national banks to accept and give security for deposits of funds made (1) by agencies or governmental instrumentalities of one or more States or political subdivisions thereof, and (2) by officers, employees, or agents, in their official capacities, of States and political subdivisions or other governmental instrumentalities to the same extent as is authorized in the case of other banking institutions in the State in which the national bank is located. National banks now have the authority to accept deposits and give security therefor in the case of funds deposited by States or political subdivisions thereof, and this act extends such authority in the manner indicated above.

NATIONAL BANKS IN TERRITORIES AND POSSESSIONS

(H. R. 7340; H. Rept. No. 2916)

This bill, H. R. 7340, passed by the House on August 21, 1950, and pending in the Senate, concerns the reserves required to be kept by national banks that are not members of the Federal Reserve System and are located in Alaska and the insular possessions or any part of the United States outside the continental limit of the United States. Under existing law the lawful money reserve requirements of such banks is an amount equal to at least 15 percent of the aggregate amount of the bank's deposits. Three-fifths of such reserve may consist of balances with other national banks, and the other two-fifths must consist of cash in the vault. The bill would reduce the amount of such reserve required to be kept in cash to one-fifth.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BRANCH BUILDINGS

(S. 3105; H. Rept. No. 2565)

This bill, S. 3105, reported by the Committee on July 14, 1950, and pending before the Committee on Rules would modify the limitations now contained in the Federal Reserve Act with respect to the cost of buildings at branches of the Federal Reserve banks. The bill would authorize the Federal Reserve banks to purchase or construct needed branch buildings without regard to the present statutory cost limitations so long as the aggregate of all costs incurred thereafter for branch-bank buildings did not exceed $10,000,000. The requirements of the several Federal Reserve banks with respect to branch building facilities cannot be met within the limitations of existing law, and the bill would provide the same relief as was provided in the act of July 30, 1947.

HOUSING

HOUSING ACT OF 1950

(Public Law 475; H. Repts. Nos. 1686 and 1893)

This act, which was enacted in April of this year, perfected and expanded Federal Housing legislation in several important respects. It has had an important effect on the extremely high production of housing, which prior to the cut-backs necessitated by the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, promised to give the production of an estimated 1,300,000 housing units this year. Such a level of housing would far have exceeded the production of housing units in any previous year.

Important changes and additions were authorized for the FHA mortgage insurance programs, additional incentives were made available under the GI home program, the purchase authority of the government secondary market for home mortgages was increased, special authorization was made available for housing at educational institutions, and a program was developed for the orderly disposal of government owned war and veteran housing. The principal additions to the existing Federal housing programs are outlined in the following summary.

1. Amendments to the National Housing Act

FHA insurance authority for home modernization and repair loans was extended to July 1, 1955, the authorization was set at $1,250,000,000 and a new and more equitable formula for calculating the insurance was provided.

A new program was provided to meet the particular problems of insurance of mortgages on small homes in suburban and outlying areas with appropriate flexibility in insurance limits to meet the needs in high cost areas. For this program an insurance authorization of $250,000,000 was made.

The FHA insurance authority with respect to sales and rental housing was adjusted to provide incentives for the production of lower-cost housing, particularly units with three and four bedrooms.

A new section 213 was added to title II of the National Housing Act providing more liberal insurance provisions for mortgage loans on cooperative housing projects, particularly those of veteran groups and the administration of the program was placed in the hands of a new Assistant Commissioner of FHA appointed for that specific purpose.

Mortgage insurance authorization for FHA title II, the basic mortgage insurance title of the National Housing Act, was increased by $2,250,000,000 and FHA section 608 rental housing insurance authorization was increased by $500,000,000.

2. Increased secondary market authorization

An additional $250,000,000 authorization was made available to the Federal National Mortgage Association for the purchase of FHA insured and VA guaranteed home loans and further safeguards were established for the exercise of this mortgage purchase authority.

3. Amendments to the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944

Amendments made to the home loan provisions of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 include (a) extension of maximum maturity from 25 to 30 years, (b) increase in maximum amount of the home loan guaranty from $4,000 or 50 percent of the loan to $7,500 or 60 percent of the loan, (c) provision for the guaranty of farm home loans, (d) home loan benefits for unremarried widows of veterans, (e) preservation of home loan benefits for veterans in certain cases where a veteran loses his GI aided home by action or circumstances over which he has no control, (f) requirement of minimum construction standards and (g) termination of the FHA-VA combination loan authority.

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act was further amended by providing $150,000,000 of stand-by authority for direct home loans to veterans in certain cases where financing is not otherwise available.

4. Housing loans to educational institutions

Authority was granted the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to make loans, not exceeding 40 years in maturity and at an interest rate of one-fourth of 1 percent over the Federal going rate, to educational institutions for the construction or modernization of housing facilities for students and faculties. An authorization of $300,000,000 was provided for such purposes.

5. Disposal of Government-owned war and veterans' housing

A new title VI was added to the Lanham Act providing for the orderly disposition of all war and veterans' housing under the jurisdiction of the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Appropriate safeguards were established to insure best disposition of such units, both permanent and temporary units, and to minimize any hardships incident to the transfer of ownership and control from the Government.

As noted above, since passage of this act the impact of the defense program on materials and manpower has necessitated a cut-back in housing programs and this has been ordered under authority of the Defense Production Act of 1950. Hence it has been necessary to modify and even temporarily suspend the operation of certain of the programs above outlined.

MILITARY RENTAL HOUSING INSURANCE

(Public Law 498; H. Rept. No. 1860)

In the first session of the Eighty-first Congress there was enacted Public Law 211 which authorized FHA mortgage insurance for rental housing constructed by private enterprise to serve the needs of personnel at military reservations. Public Law 498 amended that act primarily with respect to the procedure to be followed by prospective project sponsors. Under the old law, prospective sponsors prepared their own plans and specifications and it proved complicated and time-consuming to select the best sponsor from among the several submitting propositions because each proposition was based on different plans and specifications. The principal amendment made by Public Law 498 changed the procedure so that the armed services could enter into contracts with architects and engineers for the preparation of plans and specifications under arrangements whereby the fees for such services are later assumed by the successful sponsor. This permits a uniform procedure of competitive bidding whereby the award can be made to the lowest responsible bidder. It is providing an important impetus to this type of needed housing construction.

SHANKS VILLAGE HOUSING PROJECT

(Public Law 827; H. Rept. No. 2917)

This act relates only to the Shanks Village housing project located in Rockland County, N. Y. This veterans' temporary housing project, containing 1,500 units, is owned by the Government. Some 4 years ago the Government entered into contracts with Columbia University and the Citizens' Veterans Homes Association of Rockland County whereby the university and the association, in return for the right to refer tenants to the project, assumed certain obligations with respect to possible deficits in the operation of the project by the Government and with respect to ultimate removal of the units. In the past 4 years operation of the project by the Government has produced $475,000 of net income, which has been retained by the Government. This act authorizes and directs the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, upon request of the other respective parties to the above-mentioned contracts, to release them from the contracts. At such time the project will then revert to the same status as other temporary war and veterans' housing remaining under the jurisdiction of the Public Housing Administration and located on land under its control.

RENT CONTROL

HOUSING AND RENT ACT OF 1950

(Public Law 574; H. Repts. Nos. 2116 and 2285)

This act, enacted prior to the Korean hostilities, continued Federal rent control authority to December 31, 1950, and provided that Federal rent control could be retained in a community until June 30, 1951, if prior to December 31, 1950, and while Federal rent control was still in effect in that community, it declared by resolution of its governing body or by popular referendum that there was need for further continuance of Federal rent control in that community. With respect to local self-determination in the matter of decontrol, such authority was extended to include counties as well as incorporated cities, towns, and villages, and local government determination was made final without need for approval of such action by the governor of the State. The preference or priority afforded veterans of World War II in the purchase or rental of housing accommodations completed after June 30, 1947, was continued for a full year to the close of June 30, 1951.

FARM COMMODITIES

(Public Law 579; H. Repts. Nos. 1757 and 2269)

This act increased the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation an additional $2,000,000,000. The previous ceiling on the Corporation's borrowing authority of $4,750,000,000 was set in 1945. The Corporation was created for the purpose of stabilizing, supporting, and protecting farm income and prices, assisting in the maintenance of balanced and adequate supplies of agricultural commodities, products thereof, foods, feeds and fibers, and of facilitating the orderly distribution of agricultural commodities, and is the mechanism through which the agricultural price support operations are carried out. Throughout the Corporation's operations the farmers of America are assured of a stable income for their crops, the consumers of America are assured of an adequate supply of foodstuffs, and the economy of the Nation is cushioned against the perils inherent in agricultural production. This act also provides that the conditions under which this country could invoke import fees or quotas on agricultural commodities in order to prevent disruption of domestic farm program shall be continued in any future international trade agreement.

IMPORT CONTROLS

By the terms of this law, import-control authority over fats and oils (including oil-bearing materials, fatty acids, butter, soap, and soap powder, but excluding petroleum and petroleum products and coconuts and coconut products) and rice and rice products was authorized until July 1, 1951, upon a determination by the President that such controls are (a) essential to the acquisition or distribution of products in world short supply or (b) essential to the orderly liquidation of temporary surpluses of stocks owned or controlled by the Government. Such authority is desirable to protect farmers' marketing of the oilseed crops and to facilitate the orderly liquidation of surpluses owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

MISCELLANEOUS

RECOINAGE OF SUBSIDIARY SILVER COINS

(Public Law 509; H. Rept. No. 1957)

This act provides that the losses incurred in the recoinage of subsidiary silver coins (10-, 25-, and 50-cent pieces), the wastage incurred in silver coinage, and the cost of distributing silver coins shall be charged to a fund which arises from the coinage of silver bullion into coins of a nominal value exceeding the cost of the bullion. The losses, wastage, and costs referred to above were previously made up by appropriations for the specific purposes enumerated. The act authorizes no expenditures not now authorized but merely permits certain expenses and operations to be chargeable against revenues, rather than be dependent upon annual appropriations.

MEDALS AND PROOF COINS

(Public Law 508; H. Rept. No. 1956)

This act merely provides that the money arising from the manufacture and sale of medals and proof coins shall be reimbursed to the appropriation then current and chargeable for the cost of manufacture and sale of medals and proof coins. Previously the Bureau of the Mint paid for the manufacture of medals and proof coins from funds appropriated for that purpose, but the revenues derived from their sale had to be turned in to the general fund of the Treasury, and could not be used to offset the cost of manufacture. The act merely permits the revenues received to be used to pay the cost of manufacture.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LAND TO STATE OF RHODE ISLAND

(Public Law 737; H. Rept. No. 2915)

This act authorizes the conveyance of a stone house and former dock by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to the board of trustees of State colleges of the State of Rhode Island to be used by the Narragansett Marine Biological Laboratory of Rhode Island State colleges for marine research. The site in the authorized transfer involves a little less than 6 acres and the conveyance is conditioned (1) upon the payment to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator of an amount equivalent to 50 percent of the appraised value of the property, and (2) that the board of trustees furnish to the Government prior to December 28, 1950, a satisfactory survey of the land involved.

As American Tanks Sweep Victoriously Through Korean Streets, as Crowds of Koreans Having All the Communism That They Can Take, Cheer United Nations Troops as They Break Across the Thirty-eighth Parallel, John Steelman, Assistant to the President, Presents Another "Battle Report—Washington"

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I know of no news items which gives me greater knowledge in shorter time or less words about current events than does the teledocumentary broadcast each Sunday afternoon over the National Broadcasting Co. network under the title "Battle Report—Washington."

This, as you have come to know, is the program wherein John Steelman, the Assistant to the President, presents each week—top-flight Federal officials, administrators, and policy makers, who directly report to the American people as to their departmental and personal activities which have to do with current events.

Already, on the series, we have heard and learned a great deal about agriculture, labor, finance, social security, commerce, education, and trade, not alone with respect to the economy of this Nation but to our international economy as well.

We have already heard from many top-flight officials of our armed services—both civil and military. Additionally thereto, a number of GI's from the Navy, Army, Air Force, and Marine Corps, recently returned from the Korean battlefront, have told intimate stories of the successes and achievements as well as some of the reverses and disappointments with which their outfit met in the Korean war. Insofar as I am concerned personally, "Battle Report—Washington" is a Sunday afternoon must.

It is because of the universal interest in this program that I now wish to avail myself of the medium of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and bring to those parts of our Nation which are yet without television the all-important news disseminated over the air and the coaxial cables of the National Broadcasting Co. through "Battle Report—Washington," as telecasted on October 8, 1950.

The telecast was as follows:

ROBERT MCCORMICK. As American tanks sweep victoriously through Korea's streets, as crowds of Koreans—having had all of communism they can take—cheer United Nations troops as they break the thirty-eighth parallel, NBC television invites your attention, so recently trained on the world series, to the far more important struggle for freedom.

Washington—a dot on the east coast of the United States of America, but vital source of strength to the battle to which the arrow points in the Far East, a battle that is fast mounting to a final decision.

Today our cameras isolate Selective Service Director Hershey with a late report on the draft, Labor Secretary Maurice Tobin with the facts on our manpower situation, an ECA official to tell us what's happened to our mission in Korea, an Army observer with some pertinent observations, and three GI's literally "dressed to kill"—but first, let's follow our camera up the driveway to the East Wing of the White House, enter the doors, and visit for a moment with the Assistant to the President—Dr. John Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. Another week has passed into history. Once again, through the magic of television, we will meet with Government officials and hear reports on their activities. I wish every man, woman, and child in the world could join with us in these intimate meetings. Especially, I should like to have those behind the iron curtain witness these telecasts. All day long the Kremlin radio stations blare forth messages of hate and incredibly fantastic falsehoods. You, the people of the United States, are pictured as warmongers who are enslaved by greedy monopolists. The Soviet Union is pictured as a paradise on earth.

But because of the cowardice of the men in the Kremlin, none of the enslaved peoples are permitted any other source of information. Never before in history has any despot possessed so much power and so much wealth as the small group which rules the Soviet Union. But still they are not content. They now dictate where a man should live, where he should work and what he wears—they also want to control his thinking—to own his mind as well as his body. That indeed is the epitome of slavery.

I am convinced if the slaves behind the iron curtain could know us as we really are, a peaceful world would result—a world of friends working together to bring happiness and prosperity to all mankind. If they could see these telecasts and come to know the officials of our Government as you do—the mere thought of war would be destroyed.

Today it is my pleasure to present on Battle Report—Washington, the Honorable Maurice J. Tobin, Secretary of the Department of Labor, from whom we shall learn not alone of the tremendous contribution that labor is making to our Nation's security and world peace, but particularly as to the manner in which that contribution is being made.

Additionally thereto, we shall have the pleasure of meeting with Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Director of Selective Service, who will tell us of the problems and the achievements of his administration; Edwin C. Arnold, Director of the Korean Section of ECA; and Capt. Walter Pennio of the United States Army—ex-newspaperman and General MacArthur's former news chief—who has just returned to the States from Korea.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Forward rushes the sweep of UN's victorious troops. Above the thirty-eighth parallel—South Koreans, already 75 miles deep into what was once strictly Red territory. Below the parallel, troops like these—taking prisoners numbered in the scores of thousands. We couldn't help wondering, as perhaps you've wondered, how all this will affect the draft. So we took our cameras down to 1712 G Street, here in Washington, entered the Selective Service headquarters and asked the one man sure to know. Yes, Selective Service Director, Gen. Lewis B. Hershey. Here is General Hershey's answer:

General HERSHEY. The work of the Selective Service System will increase even though we should find a satisfactory solution of the Korean incident. The Selective Service System has before it the target established by the President of the United States as approximately, at least, 3,000,000 men in our Armed Forces. This number of men will require that the Selective Service System reexamine the different sources of manpower from which the number can be drawn. At the present time, the law provides for the responsibility upon those between 19 and 25 years of age. To provide a force of at least 3,000,000 men we will be compelled to use far more of our manpower than we have ever done in the period when we were not at war. I suppose it is well to call our present period a period of tension and then the question comes, how can we best meet the figure of 3,000,000 and disturb all of our manpower the least possible amount in order to permit the ultimate in production. There are many factors that must always be considered. Selective Service at the present time is engaged in filling the call of 170,000 men. These men will be submitted to the Armed Forces in September, October, and November. We do not know as yet what the demand will be by months later on, but it will require that we either increase the age group which does not seem to be the thing to do, or more intensively use those who are in the age bracket 19 to 25. In doing that we must search first of all to increase the acceptability of those that we submit to the Armed Forces; secondly, we must reconsider those who have, now, dependent status, and probably finally we must call on Congress to remove the restriction which now prevails against induction of veterans. If America is to become strong and remain strong, we face the prospect in years ahead of using our young men in the Armed Forces to a much greater degree than we have in recent times. It will mean that the age group between 19 and 25 must bear the larger share of this burden. Perhaps if we are successful as the years go on, we can lessen the time of service, but at the present time the indications are that probably the period of service will have to be increased rather than decreased. It is true that arrangements will have to be made to defer a few of the most important people under 26 years of age, but if we are to meet and maintain the 3,000,000 mark in our manpower, it will mean that practically every person must at some time in his career be ready to give to the greatest country on earth, as a service tax, some 30 months of his life.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Propaganda leaflets rained down upon Korea help to assure our armies of a friendly reception. But the victory itself must be won by men on the battlefield armed with machines born of our production lines at home. General Hershey has told us how many more the draft will siphon out of our manpower stream. Question: How will this affect industry—industry which supplies our guns, planes, tanks? This time we send our cameras through the door of the Department of Labor and find at his desk, prepared to answer these questions—Labor Secretary Maurice Tobin.

Hon. MAURICE J. TOBIN. Today the United Nations are rapidly bringing the fighting in Korea to a successful conclusion. At the same time, we are mobilizing to build a strong force for not only American defense, but for all the free nations which are associated with us in the United Nations.

During the course of the next several months, more than an additional million people will be added to the Armed Forces. By the first of July next year the total manpower of the Army and Navy and Air Corps will amount to approximately 3,000,000. Now all of this has very serious implications for America's economy.

Admittedly, the impact today has not been great, but we should give consideration to the fact that we have practically full employment in the United States at the present time, that for the first time in the history of America, the average weekly wage of factory workers has gone in excess of $60 a week. There are definite occupational shortages in many areas of the country even right now. But there is no over-all shortage of manpower, but this condition will not remain for very long, because as yet, the economy has not felt the full impact of defense production. There are certain occupational shortages in certain States in the country. The Labor Department has already issued a critical list of skills—approximately 80 in number—in which shortages exist at the present time, or in which there will be shortages in the not-too-distant future. The controls that are in effect at the present time are confined to controls in the allocation of materials and controls in installment credit, which are not very stringent, and probably will be made more stringent. In the not-far-distant future, as the program progresses, it will be necessary to invoke additional controls because inevitably we are going to be running into shortages of labor and shortages of plants, shortages in equipment, and last but not least, probably as important as any, real shortages of manpower.

The manpower situation today differs greatly from the situation in 1940. In 1940 we had 8,000,000 unemployed. Today that figure is down to 2,200,000. There were but 45,000,000 people gainfully employed at the start of World War II. There are 62,000,000 people gainfully employed in the United States at the present time.

So you can readily see in the event we must have all-out mobilization, our manpower situation is going to be a much more serious problem than it was at any time in World War II. Of course, like yourself, I hope, and we all hope, we will not have to have all-out mobilization, but we definitely must be prepared. That is why the Labor Department and the State employment services of the Nation, with their 1,800 national and district offices, are using every act to help in defense production to make certain defense-production goals are met.

We will have to call on people who are not ordinarily in the work force, are not ordinarily seeking employment. It means much greater utilization of women not now in the work force. Many are with skills which they developed during the last war. It means much greater utilization of handicapped people. We should then remember that we have just completed national Employ the Physically Handicapped Week. Employers of labor who had never used handicapped people before learned of the great contribution that the physically handicapped could make to production. I am confident that a great deal of production effort will come from the working people for and by physically handicapped.

In addition, it will be necessary for us to call upon older and retired workers with great skills. We expect to be able to procure approximately 5,000,000 additional workers from these sources. My advice to anyone who is seeking a defense job is to go to his local employment office. First, learn the opportunities that are to be found in your own community. We are attempting in every possible way to eliminate needless migration. Most people desiring to do defense work are able to find opportunities in their own local communities. I would also strongly urge the employers to take advantage of the facilities of the employment service. There are to be found professional skills that will enable them to handle their difficult personnel jobs in the days that lie ahead.

Now it is a tremendous job, in spite of all of us, and, as Americans, everyone of us should pitch in and do our proportionate share. There will be sacrifices, and taxes are bound to be higher. There are certain materials and the like that we will be able to procure today that we may not be able to procure in the days that lie ahead. But all of us working together in this great defense effort can make America so strong that we can contribute to the strengthening of our allies to the point where we will be able, all giving everything that we have to preserve peace in the world.

Mr. McCORMICK. Soldiers on the march here at home, soldiers battling in Korea's summer heat, soldiers in snow-covered terrain, forced to fight cold and ice as well as the enemy—all bring to the Quartermaster Corps the same question that's on your wife's mind today—yes, clothes. And so now—now we give you Battle Report's own style show, a view of what the well-dressed GI is presently wearing in combat and a preview of what he'll be wearing tomorrow, all done—(aside) within the limits of television, of course—somewhat like a very special strip-tease. At the microphone, style-conscious Dave Brinkley.

DAVE BRINKLEY. First on Battle Report's runway, Pfc Carl McInnis from Dothan, Ala., modeling the uniform worn by GI's in Korea today, and fully equipped with M–1 rifle, cartridge belt, and pack. That object attached on the outside is what the Army likes to call his entrenching tool—just the thing for digging foxholes this season.

His uniform is of a cotton fabric, herringbone twill. Outer layer, jacket and trousers, topped by steel helmet.

Under the jacket, a layer of cotton underwear.

Now let's take a look inside his pack. There are his rations, his change of socks, and here is his toilet kit, containing razor, soap, towel, and toothbrush.

And this handy item is called a poncho. That's Army for raincoat.

Now the well-dressed GI you're about to see is Pvt. Peter Stefanchik, of Yonkers, N. Y. He is showing you what they'll be wearing in Korea this coming winter, in fact, part of the outfit will be issued around the middle of this month.

He is dressed in what is known as the wet-cold uniform—designed on the Army's layer principle—outer layer, wind resistant and water repellent, inner clothing of wool materials, which makes the most use of air pockets as insulation.

Let's ask Private Stefanchik to go into his strip tease.

Upper body wear—observe the private's field jacket serving as an outer shell—wind resistant and water repellent. Beneath this another jacket of field pile. This normally is worn in extreme temperatures, and is carried with him at other times.

Under both jackets—a high-neck sweater slipover, which covers a flannel shirt.

Next the undershirt—50 percent wool and 50 percent cotton.

Now if you'll give the private's feet the eye, you'll see the Army's answer to the soldier's age-old problem of trench foot—a waterproof boot, part rubber, inside of which is worn a felt insole and two pairs of wool ski socks. He's given an extra change of socks so he can dry the wet ones against his body next day.

Now the Army's dry-cold uniform, designed to protect our GI's in temperatures where there's always snow on the ground, always below freezing—this apparition is Corp. John W. Lemon, of Pittsburgh.

The overwhite is worn purely for camouflage purposes.

Under that we find his costume varies from the wet-cold only in this way—the outer layer is a parka shell, with a parka lining, and with the hood attached.

Note the hood, if you will—it's provided with an extension that has a fur ruff, with a malleable wire inside so he can adjust it around his face to protect him from snow and wind.

The feet, too, are specially covered—the outer layer consists of muckluk boots—the sole made of very flexible leather * * * and the upper part of canvas. They're not waterproof because they don't need to be where the weather is always below freezing. Inside each boot he wears heavy felt socks, plus two pairs of ski socks, plus a wool cushion, plus two felt insoles.

And that's what the well-dressed GI is wearing this season. The Quartermaster Corps has issued him everything that goes with the finest kind of clothing—except hand-painted neckties.

Mr. McCORMICK. War cuts deeper scars on Korea every day, breeds havoc, havoc that leaves in its wake torn and divided families, starvation, demolished homes, disrupted transportation. Caught in Korea when war erupted was a mission of the Economic Cooperation Administration, sent there to help the new Republic of Korea to get on its economic feet. Since attached to the unified command, they've been doing yeoman service during the fighting, helping to sustain the civilian economy. For a more complete report on how this mission is carrying on in Korea, we focus now upon the Acting Director of the Korean Section of ECA, Edwin G. Arnold.

EDWIN G. ARNOLD. After most of Korea was overrun, obviously, our original program had to be thrown into the discard, at least temporarily. But members of the ECA staff remained in Korea, attached to the unified command, to do everything in their legal power to help maintain the civilian economy and keep the wheels of industry turning 24 hours a day. This was most essential to the UN military action.

The technical men succeeded in boosting textile production in the Pusan area to nearly the total of the whole Republic prior to the war; power experts coaxed diesel, steam, and hydroelectric plants to put out sufficient juice to keep the lights on in the factories, and other ECA experts worked around the clock to help keep urgently needed supplies rolling through the ports and along the rails. Financial experts helped the Korean Government fight inflation. Still others helped coordinate contributions of relief supplies from many United Nations members.

In early September the picture changed again, as rapidly as it had changed with the North Korean onslaught. United Nations forces launched an attack at Inchon, quickly moved on to Seoul, and in a matter of days almost the whole of the southern peninsula was in United Nations' hands. With this, ECA's task doubled, if not trebbled.

Responsibility for civilian relief is now in the hands of the unified command. ECA is now charged with implementing and augmenting the task which was our original objective, to assist and advise the Republic of Korea in organizing and rebuilding its economy.

We know that a lot of damage has been done. Most of Seoul is rubble. The same is true of Taejon, Pohang and a dozen other towns. The power system has been seriously damaged, and transportation and communications equipment wrecked. The civilian population in some urban areas stands close to starvation and, in the months to come, may be faced with death by disease and exposure. Inflation is again a serious threat.

Members of ECA's mission returned to Seoul a few days ago to assist in patching up whatever facilities are left, to assess the damage, and begin the purchase of urgently needed supplies.

Congressional appropriation of funds for Korea for the current fiscal year is $90,000,000. Since the invasion, we have spent more than twenty-one million, including some left over from last year's funds. Of the ninty million for this year more than half will go for the purchase of fertilizer, cotton, rubber, coal, and petroleum products. About thirty million is earmarked for supplies to rehabilitate docks, warehouses, electric-power installations and industrial projects.

Ultimately, the United Nations will carry the burden of the rehabilitation and recovery work, to make Korea a free, independent and virile democracy, with a free and healthy economy.

Meanwhile, ECA will carry on with its original objective of helping a peace-loving people achieve economic stability, free from outside support.

Mr. McCORMICK. As you can see, war is not all "guns and glory." Much of it is nothing more than drudgery, mud, and slime. Yes, the good earth in Korea is hard to take when it's wet. Skilled observers accompany our troops to note their reactions under tough combat conditions, that our Armed Forces may learn whatever lessons are to be learned for future reference. Such eagle-eyed and keen minded observers were in the seige of Taegu, landed with the marines at Inchon, and only yesterday, an old friend who is one of them—an exnewsman and MacArthur's former news chief—just returned Stateside, dropped by to see me at our NBC television offices. For the first-hand observations of a skilled observer—meet combat infantryman, Capt. Walter Pennino.

Is it as bad this time as it was last time around?

Captain PENNINO. Yes, Bob; it's just as bad and it's quite rough out there.

Mr. McCORMICK. Shall we say this is the roughest yet?

Captain PENNINO. I don't think the infantrymen kid themselves about it. I don't think that the combat infantryman hopes for any better break than dust and mud and a hot meal and an occasional shower, and of course, the mail from home. Otherwise, other than that, there is very little he can do to make himself comfortable. The area of Korea is just not one of those places where you can be clean and comfortable.

Of course, nobody is scrounging around the countryside the way they did in World War II. The things that are available there are just not edible and there is quite a bit of dysentery and the boys don't want any of that. The C and K rations are good enough for them. They have seen what dysentery can do to good men. Of course, you have probably heard about the horrible smells out there. They are just as bad as people say they are and because of these odors the boys can't really develop a real appetite. The odors are caused by the fertilizer which is night soil and the people continue to fertilize their crops much as they have for centuries. What makes matters worse is that the boys not only have to eat near these places and have to smell these odors, they also have to work in it. They have to dig their gun emplacements and their slit trenches and foxholes.

The water situation wasn't much different. It wasn't drinkable. However, there was a lot of it. The engineers operating the water point purifying the water and water points all over the front lines. The bad situation was that you couldn't count on the water point being in the same place that you had seen it yesterday, the reason being that the engineers not only had to operate these large canvas tanks and water-purification units, but they also had to defend them because of the infiltration. The North Korean Communists had a talent for coming in on the flanks and in the rear of artillery batteries and such units as water point.

The village offered little more comfort than the sparse hillside or the stenchy rice fields. Probably the only comfort out of the village was that you had some cover from the rain but, of course, the odors were still with you. This dust they tell you about is a very fine red powder that settles every place—choking dust. The men wore handkerchiefs over their faces and looked pretty much like wild-west bandits.

There may have been rougher, dirtier, more dismal places to fight a war, but it would be sheer folly to tell the gallant men of the Twenty-fourth Division and the Twenty-fifth and First Cavalry Divisions different. For them it is the roughest ever. Of course, it should be. The only relief from the dust was mud if you had a preference for discomfort.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Thus the Nation, America—as men working behind the battle in this Nation's Capital have come before our cameras to report to you—thus the Nation stands this ——— day of war. Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another Teledocumentary—this, then, against the background of battlefront Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your ninth Battle Report, Washington.

Austrian Restitution Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter of October 4, 1950, which I addressed to the Honorable Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, together with the reply from the Department of State signed by Ben. H. Brown, Jr., in which letters there is set forth information which I believe will be of interest to Senators concerning the proposals pending in the Austrian Parliament to amend the restitution legislation and the commendable efforts of our Government to point out the undesirable character of these amendments to Austrian leaders.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 4, 1950.

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
State Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have recently been disappointed to learn that several of the political parties in Austria are introducing and supporting undesirable amendments to the restitution law, and would greatly appreciate learning from you what steps our Government is taking to secure thoughtful reconsideration of these policies by the Austrians and if possible to prevent the enactment of the amendments.

The restitution of looted property, according to my understanding, has been an important point in allied wartime and postwar policy. The principle is also in accord with every civilized concept of justice. Austria has had such a restitution law for sometime, but now, in an apparent bid for the votes of the pardoned "minor Nazis" both the People's Party and the Socialist Party have proposed amendments to the restitution law which would effectively emasculate it.

It is unfortunate that the restitution program has not already been completed by this date, 5½ years after the Nazi defeat. For a friendly country to amend the law so as to reopen past cases and impede pending cases would be even worse.

I am confident you will agree that Austria will prejudice its position before the world if it should finally adopt such amendments, and I hope the representatives of our Government can advise the leaders in Austria that any such course would arouse serious criticism in this country. I shall be grateful for any information which you can send to me on this matter.

Sincerely,

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 11, 1950.

The Honorable PAUL H. DOUGLAS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR DOUGLAS: The Department refers to your letter of October 4, 1950, regarding your concern over the recent amendments to Austrian restitution legislation introduced into the Austrian Parliament.

You will be interested to know that strong representations to the Austrian Government were made by the legation in Vienna within a few days after the bill to amend restitution legislation was introduced into the Austrian Parliament in July.

The Department shares fully your feeling that amendments to the restitution legislation that would reopen past cases, would be completely contrary to the policy of protecting Nazi persecutees that the United States has constantly emphasized in its negotiation with the Austrian Government.

You may be assured that the Department will be do everything in its power to insure that undesirable amendments to the restitution legislation do not become law.

Sincerely yours,

BEN H. BROWN, Jr.,
Acting Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations
(For the Secretary of State).

The Medill Letter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following address by Col. Robert R. McCormick, editor and publisher of the Chicago Tribune, delivered on the Chicago Tribune of the Air, over WGN, WGNB, and the Mutual Broadcasting System, Saturday, October 7, 1950:

The Library of Congress has given to Senator TOBEY, and the latter has published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a letter written by Joseph Medill to Congressman Washburne on January 14, 1863, never before published, suggesting that Vicksburg and Port Hudson should be taken; Arkansas and Texas conquered; Louisiana would fall to the holder of the Mississippi; then the war should be stopped, leaving to the Confederacy the States of North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi to be conquered when convenient, and that Canada should be taken.

Of the seven States which Medill would have let secede, the poverty of the soil of Georgia was well known. Florida was practically a swamp. The other four States were poor in resources.

In my biography of Grant, I pointed out how strong the Southeastern States were with the labyrinth of Virginia to the north, the sand bars off the coast, and the Appalachian Mountains to the west.

Medill considered that all the generals except Grant were either slavery men or incompetent, and he was right. Sherman's biographer, Lloyd Lewis, says that Sherman did not learn his generalship from Grant until after the Vicksburg campaign.

Medill wanted the Army to go on the defensive in Virginia and 40,000 men sent west. This was done later in the year. Medill wanted the garrisons added to the armies in the field. Grant did this when he came into power.

That brings to mind a number of facts that have been recorded, but generally forgotten, and one important fact which I think no historian has ever pointed out. Much as I have written about the Civil War, its significance had not been apparent to me before.

Wars are not started over any one difference * * * nor was the Civil War. The first cause of offense was the tariff that gave New England industries a monopoly in the South. This led to the nullification acts of South Carolina during President Jackson's term and has been a continuing grievance until recently.

The next difference was that the Republicans of the Middle West insisted that slavery should not be admitted into any more territories.

The third cause was the ambition of Charleston to become an important seaport and the fourth was the animosity of the Democratic officeholders, who had been in power in Washington for 60 years. As a matter of fact, it was these two minor causes which brought on the war—the firing upon Fort Sumter and the efforts of the southerners to take the capital, projecting well into slave territory, which led to the Baltimore riots, the capture of Baltimore, the crossing of the Potomac into Virginia, and eventually to the battle of Bull Run.

With the solidarity we have achieved in 87 years, it is difficult to realize how much the sections of the North were activated by different motives.

Lincoln was the outstanding leader for the preservation of the Union. He said:

"I would save the Union. I would save it the shortest way under the Constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will be 'the Union as it was.' If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union, and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union."

The abolitionists, of whom Medill was one, wished to destroy slavery at all costs. As early as 1862, Lincoln found it necessary to conciliate them by the Emancipation Proclamation. They eventually became the dominant element in the war.

New England was not seriously interested in either abolition of slavery or the preservation of the Union. The New Englanders had been the slave traders until that form of commerce was stopped under the leadership of Jefferson. They had joined England against the United States in the War of 1812, supplying the English armies, which otherwise could not have operated, and refused troops to the national government. Their leaders opposed the purchase of Louisiana and the annexation of Texas in the following incendiary language.

Josiah Quincy said:

"If this bill (for the admission of Orleans Territory as a State) passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of the Union; that it will free the States from their moral obligation; and, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must."

John Quincy Adams said:

"Any attempt by act of Congress or by treaty to annex the Republic of Texas to this Union would be an usurpation of power which it would be the right and the duty of the free people of the Union to resist and annul."

Daniel Webster put the mistaken New England view in an argumentative way:

"And he is a bolder reasoner than I, who has satisfied himself that this Government may be extended indefinitely either to the north or to the south, without endangering its stability and its duration. * * *

"It certainly may be very well questioned, with how much of mutual intelligence, and how much of a spirit of conciliation and harmony, those who live on the St. Lawrence and the St. John might be expected ordinarily to unite in the choice of a President, with the inhabitants on the banks of the Rio Grande del Norte and the Colorado. It is evident, at least, that there must be some boundary, or some limits to a republic which is to have a common center."

The Hartford convention would have declared for secession excepting for the existence of the triumphant armies of Jacob Brown and Andrew Jackson.

From the treaty of peace following the Revolutionary War, the West was constantly exercised over the navigation of the Mississippi. Medill was a western man and an abolitionist. He wanted the Southwest in the Union as free States. He cared little about the Southeast, nothing about the protective tariff. The West had wanted the annexation of Canada since 1812, to which the East was indifferent. In arguing that Illinois should join the Union side, Douglas had said:

"We in the northwest of this great valley can never recognize either the propriety or the right of States bordering along the Gulf of Mexico and upon the Atlantic Ocean, or upon the Pacific, to separate from the Union of our forefathers, and establish and erect tax gatherers and custom houses upon our commerce in its passage to the gulf or the ocean. If we recognize the right in one case we give our assent to it in all cases, and if the few States upon the gulf now are to separate themselves from us and erect a barrier across the mouth of that great river, of which the Ohio is a tributary, how long will it be before New York may come to the conclusion that she may set up for herself and levy taxes upon every dollar's worth of goods imported and consumed in the northwest, and taxes upon every bushel of wheat and every pound of pork and beef, or other productions that may be sent from the northwest to the Atlantic in search of a market? The very existence of the people in this great valley depends upon maintaining inviolate and forever that great right secured by the Constitution of freedom of trade, of transit, and of commerce, from the center of the continent to the oceans that surround it. This right can never be surrendered; our very existence depends upon maintaining it."

The significant fact that has eluded historians is that in January 1863, the cause of the Union was at its lowest ebb. McClellan had been beaten in the peninsula. Pope had lost the second battle of Bull Run. Burnside had been defeated at Fredericksburg and had failed in his famous mud march.

In the middle sector, Nashville was the advanced post which had been besieged. Confederate troops had been to Cincinnati, and even into Ohio. Grant had been defeated at Holly Springs and Sherman at Vicksburg.

The trans-Mississippi campaigns did not loom in the public mind. In the main theater, only Grant had achieved even modest success. He had shown none of the genius which he developed six months later at Vicksburg and Lee had not made his fatal invasion of Pennsylvania.

We may wonder what might have happened if Lee had adopted Longstreet's suggestion in May 1863, to leave Lee to hold the line of the Rapidan and Longstreet to take his corps to attack Rosecrans, while Grant was still occupied at Vicksburg. It is not beyond the possibilities that Longstreet would have destroyed Rosecrans and then have forced Grant to raise the siege of Vicksburg * * * for even after Vicksburg and Gettysburg, victory was not in sight. Bragg, reinforced by Longstreet, was to win the almost decisive battle of Chickamauga. After that Medill's suggestions that troops be sent west were carried out. With the help of these troops Grant broke the mountain barrier and Sherman made his great campaign in which he captured Atlanta and turned the Appalachian mountain range. He then, in the fall of 1864, conceived the march to the sea.

At the time of Medill's letter Sherman was completely hopeless of victory and did not think highly of Grant. New York was about to have its draft riots. One county of New York did secede from the Union. Later, Sherman, a westerner from Ohio, was to write to Grant when Grant was made commander in chief:

"Now as to the future: Do not stay in Washington. Halleck is better qualified than you are to stand the buffets of intrigue and policy. Come out West. Take to yourself the whole Mississippi Valley; let us make it dead sure and I tell you the Atlantic slope and Pacific shores will follow its destiny as sure as the limbs of a tree live or die with the main trunk."

And the last paragraph in the same letter:

"For God's sake and for your country's sake, come out of Washington. I foretold to General Halleck, before he left Corinth, the inevitable result to him, and I now exhort you to come out West. Here lies the seat of the coming empire, and from the West, when our task is done, we will make short work of Charleston and Richmond and the impoverished coast of the Atlantic."

And just before Appomattox, Sheridan, who was from Albany, N. Y., felt:

"If I obeyed these instructions and crossed the James and joined Sherman, the army of the Potomac would rest where they are and Sherman, with our assistance, would close the war. If this should happen it would be disastrous to the country, for there would be no balance of power between the East and the West."

In the end all the objects of the northern factions were secured: Vicksburg and Port Hudson were taken; Arkansas was conquered; Texas was isolated and partially occupied.

The army of Vicksburg, joining the armies of the Cumberland and Ohio, with reinforcements from the East, finished the war in North Carolina. The army of the Potomac only penetrated 100 miles from Culpeper to Appomattox.

Slavery was abolished, the Union was preserved, and the New England tariff continued for another 70 years.

Of the quarrels with Canada, that of Indian invasion had disappeared. The others were settled in the treaty concluding the Alabama claims, a clever piece of diplomacy, concealing the fact that the arbitration was only consented to by Great Britain under threat of an invasion of Canada.

Internal Security Act of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD for the information of Members of Congress a statement issued October 1, 1950, by the 10 Senators who supported the President's veto of the Internal Security Act of 1950 and a series of editorials from leading newspapers in all parts of the country commenting upon the passage of the Internal Security Act. The accompanying articles supplement the 10 editorials included in the fine statement of Congressman CLARENCE CANNON in the Appendix to the RECORD, beginning at page A7025.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATORS CHAVEZ, DOUGLAS, GRAHAM, GREEN, HUMPHREY, KEFAUVER, KILGORE, LEAHY, LEHMAN, AND MURRAY

We, the undersigned Senators, opposed the Mundt-McCarran bill because it would not give adequate security but would seriously endanger freedom. We now hope that when Congress reconvenes in the calmer, post-election atmosphere, it may repeal or drastically modify this unwise law and enact a positive, effective security program, and we shall continue to work for this objective.

Nevertheless, now that it has become law, we are confident that in the best democratic tradition all Americans will loyally obey this measure. For it was passed by Congress under democratic procedures and represented the judgment of the overwhelming majority of the Members of both Houses. We believe the decision was a mistake but, as believers in democracy, we should bow to the will of the majority.

Secondly, we urge with all the emphasis at our command that under no conditions should loyal and liberal-minded Americans who oppose the act help the Communists or join in organizations with them in their hypocritical attacks against the Mundt-Ferguson-McCarran Act. Communist Party members are a devious and deceitful group, whose primary loyalty is to a foreign power. While they claim full freedom of speech for themselves when they are in a minority, they refuse to accord it to others when they take power. The Communists aim at violent revolution and not peaceful political action or genuine civil liberties. They are under the control of the Russian dictatorship and a large percentage of their members would be ready to spy and to commit acts of sabotage against us when a test of loyalties came.

Yet experience has taught us that they invariably seek to use an issue like the Mundt-Ferguson-McCarran Act for their party purposes. Thus, an act which purports to strike at them will undoubtedly be the occasion for new Communist Party manipulations and appeals. United-front organizations will be set up with the avowed aim of securing the act's repeal. Defense funds will be gathered to protect the martyrs. Citizens generally will be urged to join in these efforts. But the control and benefit as usual will be kept for the party and its ultimate, antidemocratic objectives. And in the long run such maneuvering will boomerang and hurt the whole campaign for the act's repeal.

We should not permit such a dastardly group to represent themselves as the defenders of that freedom which they would destroy. And unsuspecting, decent persons should not be drawn into their trap. Liberal-minded people should not join such Communist-sponsored organizations which are urging repeal of the McCarran bill, attend Communist-sponsored meetings, or sign Communist-sponsored petitions. They should carefully scrutinize organizations which claim to be working for these ends and avoid the slightest association with so-called united fronts with Communists. To isolate and expose the Communists in this and other efforts, the blunderbuss registration provisions of the act are not nearly as effective as the common sense, the experience, and the guidance of those who have been through these battles before.

Finally, we urge all loyal, liberal-minded Americans to develop their own methods and use existing non-Communist and anti-Communist organizations to urge the repeal of the Mundt-Ferguson-McCarran Act and the substitution for it of a measure that will give adequate security with the least impairment of liberty. Even these efforts will be attacked by some persons, just as an attempt was made in the last minutes of the Senate debate to discredit the fight of the President and Members of Congress upholding the veto by associating our sincere efforts against this legislation with the activities of persons of alleged Communist sympathies with whom we had no connection or contact. But those who understand the threat to freedom in this law will not be so easily frightened. While loyally observing the law, they should urge its early repeal or modification by constitutional methods conducted by existing loyal organizations and by new bodies free from Communist domination or influence.

Only so can the real grounds of our objective be made clear. We are not interested in protecting Communists. We are interested in protecting both the security and the freedom of America.

[From the San Francisco Chronicle of September 30, 1950]

REEXAMINE MCCARRAN DELUSION

It has been widely said that the Communist control bill that Congress passed into law over President Truman's veto received only haphazard congressional attention as to content. Almost nobody had read it entirely; a few more had thumbed through parts of it; many had only glanced at it. This seems incredible, for a body of citizens who comprise the legislative branch of the most powerful Government on earth. But we are forced to accept it as true. If the bill had been read and understood by most Congressmen it could not have been adopted. It is a sad thing when hysteria grips the very core of our representative Government, but it clearly happened in this case.

Fortunately, the congressional action is not irrevocable. There will be time, between now and the resumption of Congress in November, for the Members to read the measure and consider what they have written into law. And there will be time upon returning to Washington to repeal the measure, or so drastically amend it as to undo the bulk of the damage. Some sound guidance is provided by the President's veto message, which likewise was evidently not read or listened to with any attentiveness. It is a good message, rooted in practical truth. We do not think the President was speaking politically in this message; he was offering the best judgment of the best minds in Government—in the Justice Department, the Defense Department, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the Department of State—as to why and in what respects the bill is a dangerous one.

It isn't necessary, in the establishment of the measure as dangerous, to go into the relatively abstruse matters of thought control and freedom of speech. Important though it is to keep the national direction straight in these matters, we can understand how confusions can develop about them, even in Congress, where the sound and the fury can throw a block against consecutive, reasonable logic.

There are dangers in the bill that glare out at even the casual reader—dangers that have to do with our physical safety now, not our spiritual welfare in the distant future.

The requirement of the publication of a complete list of vital defense establishments is one such.

TO PUBLISH IS TO HAND IT OVER TO THE RUSSIANS

Any Congressman must know that to publish such a list is equivalent to handing it to the Russians—a detailed blueprint of exactly where we have installed every defense plant, every laboratory, every storage place for matériel. The Russians would give their eye teeth to get hold of such a list. This bill—this measure so widely and loudly hawked as the answer to the Communist menace—would hand it to them, as the President says, on a silver platter.

Even more devastating to our cause is the requirement for the registration of all Communists and officials of front organizations.

In the first place, this clause of the bill misses the whole point of what the American people are trying to do about the Communist menace. The point is not to pillory a lot of pinkos, or parade them before public scorn. The point is to prevent spies and saboteurs from damaging our Nation.

This bill would not only fail directly to trap any genuine spies or saboteurs, who after all would not be silly enough to put their right names or affiliations on any register, but it would gravely jeopardize the chances of the Federal Bureau of Investigation of catching the real culprits. For if the FBI is going to have to run down and keep under surveillance all of the thousands of people who happen at one time or another to have belonged to Communist-controlled organizations, it's going to have little time left over to do the vital work of trailing and rounding up the authentic bad actors.

FBI WOULD HAVE TO TURN ITS FILES INSIDE OUT

Furthermore, the FBI's responsibility for getting the goods on all the people covered by the registration law would automatically require that agency to make convincing showings in court of the guilt of the persons rounded up. The FBI has already shown great reluctance to drag out its confidential files for public perusal—again because you can't make a thing public without also letting Russia in on it. But in the procedure mapped out by the new law the FBI would in all likelihood have to turn its files inside out, day after day. And if the FBI is going to have to bare its records and its sources of information to public view it might as well go out of business. We think there is hardly an American who wouldn't entrust his security to the FBI ten times sooner than to the authors of the current Communist control bill.

We believe, then, that this measure was railroaded through under pressure of a something's-got-to-be-done hysteria which lost track utterly of just what it was that had to be done.

Congress, on resuming its session, should go carefully and methodically into the matter of how to deal with the problem of spies and saboteurs. Admittedly the problem stands this time to be more critical than it has ever been before. We have to have the legal authority and the physical apparatus to head these people off before they can do their wrecking. We have to keep them out of Government, out of places where they can do their damage. But there are ways this can be done effectively, and there are certain clear principles that can guide Congress in reaching a rational plan. One is that you have to use stealth and cunning equivalent to their own—you can't go viewhalloing all over the countryside and expect to find them in their holes when you get there. Another is that the job is one for experts, for professionals. We still think J. Edgar Hoover is the top authority on what needs to be done to get and keep the Communists under control. He ought to be heeded next time. And, finally, it is both reasonable and practical to produce a Communist control measure that embodies a minimum of lost motion and that cleaves as nearly as possible to those principles of democratic thought and procedure by which we have always abided. Considered from these viewpoints, the current measure is an awkward, panic-bred, confusion-ridden first attempt, and should be written off as such at the first opportunity.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of September 26, 1950]

CONGRESS SETS UP SHOP IN THOUGHT CONTROL

It is ironical that what may well turn out to be President Truman's soundest and most positive veto message would be the one most decisively rejected by Congress. This was the case in overwhelming passage of the "anti-subversive" bill. In an intellectual sense the action is kin to physical reprisals which in war are called atrocities, like those by North Koreans upon prisoners of war.

The action was taken out of a palpable mixture of motives. The very clamor to get at the bill quickly before Congress adjourned for political campaigning was a revelation of intent. It was a concession to and an exploitation of a national mood of uncertainty, fear, and vengeance. A commentary may be found in that of the 10 Senators who voted to support the President's vigorous protest, none is up for re-election save HERBERT LEHMAN, of New York. And as to him, the suggestion that he is risking his political life was openly voiced, a virtual confession that a noxious infection is in the air.

In this haste there was no consideration of obvious truths in the President's veto message. For one, the patchwork bill is likely to prove unworkable, not to speak of its affront to principles of freedom, its invitation to abuse and persecution. None of the overriding majority gave heed to the plain fact that the Justice Department and the FBI are now turned into a great agency for policing words, actions, attitudes, thoughts.

In many ways the bill which was passed, vetoed, and repassed in the hysterical closing hours of Congress goes beyond the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798—and these, it is recalled today to every child in school, bore themselves the stamp of an aberration.

Today's new law sets up a definite instrumentality of search and seizure. The new repression goes beyond the other in its dangers because it is so loose and general in its proscriptions. It could be applied to the ruination of any critic of the Government. It could be applied to the suppression of a new political party, as John F. Day, of the Courier-Journal Washington Bureau, pointed out in the Passing Show of Sunday's newspaper. Mr. Day recited a section of the bill which defines it as unlawful for a person "knowingly to combine, conspire, or agree with any other person to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship." And what sort of act is in mind? It surely must give one pause to read on in his report: "One of the sponsors of the bill, Senator MCCARRAN, of Nevada, said that to admit belief in something was 'an overt act.'"

Does not one see substance, therefore, in the President's warning that this Government has now been put in the thought-control business?

Already this business is being organized. The Department of Justice starts setting up its enforcement unit. Obedient to Congress though he had fought passage of the bill, Attorney General McGrath says it must necessarily be large and costly. It will also be faced with a task of enormous proportions and inevitable slow motion, what with the interminable process of trials and appeals from court to court. None may expect to see his pet Communist or the officers of the Progressive Party or any other nagging and vociferous liberal behind the bars for years, if ever.

And so we have, as a law, a handy sounding board for expression of rage and hatred for communism. But we do not have a law that will prevent espionage, sabotage, and the operation of clandestine conspirators. It is these that are the danger today, not the ineffectual radicals who already are known to authorities, and whom the new law will but serve to drag laboriously once more into the light. At the same time, though, no other man is safe, by whatever good works and intentions, from being dragged likewise through smears, libels, falsifications. The Government itself is not safe, because the new law tears away the veils of defense security to serve a mad impulse of universal suspicion. A terror is on the land, and this is its mantle.

[From the Commonweal of October 6, 1950]

CONTROLS

Marxist communism is more than idea—it is a set of beliefs incarnated in the Soviet Union. The ideas behind Russian communism and those that move American democracy are strikingly antithetical. So there is all the difference in the world between life in the United States of America and in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

But when the Members of the Eighty-first Congress went back home after their long and tough session on Capitol Hill, the differences between the two countries were not as great as they had been. It would surely be an exaggeration to say that the gentlemen of Congress had doused the lights of American freedom. Yet in their blind anger against the forces of world communism, they did take a step down the road that leads to the totalitarian darkness. And that must be a matter for regret.

Before the Congressmen finally boarded the trains and planes carrying them to their homes in the 48 States, they left behind them, as the law of the land, H. R. 9490, the Internal Security Act of 1950. As President Truman said when he vetoed the act, H. R. 9490, despite the sincere intention to draw up a drastic Communist-control law, is more pro- than anti-Communist.

There is no free exchange of ideas in Soviet Russia. Invariably the heretic is harassed, hounded, and eventually eliminated with cool, cruel efficiency. That is one application of the Leninist philosophy. In the United States, of course, we have a different notion about freedom of thought. We are more afraid of the suppression of ideas than of their public expression.

H. R. 9490 provides in section 22 that we will henceforth exclude from our country anyone who advocates any form of totalitarian government or one-party system—whether he be Russian agent, Yugoslav functionary, Argentine naval officer, Portuguese professor or Spanish Jesuit.

There is no freedom of the press in Russia. Books, magaiznes, newspapers, pamphlets, whatever is critical of the Soviet regime, are ruthlessly suppressed. This too is part and parcel of the system most of us despise.

H. R. 9490 provides that the Attorney General is required to deport aliens in any way associated with publishing or distributing material that expresses belief in the economic or political doctrines of any form of totalitarianism. This includes Marxists of every dispensation, the more ardent Francophiles, the queer little men with their queer little doctrines who inhabit the Columbus circles and bughouse squares of America. A refugee who sells a copy of Das Kapital in a second-hand bookstore is liable to deportation.

The Soviet Government maintains a strict iron curtain around itself and its satellites. It does not believe in freedom of movement. It goes to drastic extremes to protect its citizens from the contagion—and free air—of the outside world.

H. R. 9490 sharply limits the right of the United States Government to admit foreigners on diplomatic business. With the Internal Security Act the Government can no longer offer asylum in this country to foreign diplomats who have repudiated Soviet imperialism and wish to escape reprisals.

These are only a few of the provisions of the act. Those dealing with the control of Communists—which is what the act set out to do—are themselves generally ambiguous, inefficient and, insofar as they jeopardize the rights of innocent men and women who may be the victims of unfounded suspicion, due to vague terminology, are downright dangerous to our national welfare.

H. R. 9490 is an unhappy piece of legislation. In a way, it represents a small victory for the Communists. America will be a little less America while it remains on the books. There will be that much less for all of us to believe in.

[From the Chicago (Ill.) Sun-Times of September 26, 1950]

A MAJOR MISTAKE

Congress and the people of the United States may never know how seriously the McCarran Communist-control bill will give aid and comfort to the very Communists it is supposed to control.

The opening paragraph of President Truman's veto message took away the breath of many sincere Congressmen who had been supporting the bill. The President rejected the bill after consulting with:

The Department of Justice;
The Department of Defense;
The Central Intelligence Agency;
The Department of State.

These are the agencies responsible for the security of our Nation. The Central Intelligence Agency is our espionage division. When that Agency gives an opinion that any piece of legislation will hurt its functioning, the American people should give sober thought to the opinion.

But Congress was in no mood for sober thought. It was politically and emotionally hell-bent to pass some law against Communists.

Here's an example. There are people behind the iron curtain upon whom we must depend for information. From time to time this country gets them out, as refugees, as immigrants, as special cases. The McCarran bill will prevent them from coming here. That will help the Communist cause.

The bill will cut off immigration from some other countries. As the President points out, by excluding persons from totalitarian countries the McCarran bill will prevent all Spanish businessmen and students from coming here.

That is only one aspect, and a relatively minor one, which shows how ill-considered the McCarran bill really was.

Of more importance is the warning by the President that the net effect of the bill will "help the Communists, not hurt them." Already the Communist Party in this country has served notice it will defy the law. The President anticipated that.

He warned that enforcing the feature of the law which requires Communists, Communist organizations, and Communist-front organizations to register may bring a long court fight which could drag out 2 to 4 years.

Even after a final ruling—if it is against the Communist Party—the Communists need only to change the names of their organizations and force the Government to "begin all over again the long, dreary process of investigative, administrative, and judicial proceedings." The energies of the FBI would be wasted and its sources of information dried up.

The President warned that the bill itself represented "a clear and present danger to our institutions." Innocent, non-Communist persons could be harassed by its workings.

There is only one course now left for the Government to protect itself against the hysteria which resulted in the passage of the bill. A quick decision on the bill's constitutionality by the Supreme Court is needed. Unfortunately, the Court cannot toss out the whole bill even if it finds parts of it unconstitutional.

The President's warning that the bill would "so greatly weaken our liberties and give aid and comfort to those who would destroy us" was taken too lightly by Congress. The Supreme Court can consider the bill in a climate less fogged by hysteria. If it is possible for the Attorney General to bring a suit for a declaratory judgment by the high court, he should take immediate action.

THE ANTI-COMMUNIST LAW

As expected, the Internal Security Act of 1950 has now been passed by both Houses of Congress over President Truman's veto. There are certain features of this hodgepodge piece of legislation that will genuinely strengthen the internal security of the United States against Communist subversion. Such are the provisions for closing loopholes in the espionage, sabotage, military security and deportation laws, and for summary arrest and detention of probable spies or saboteurs when the President proclaims an emergency. These laudable features of the new law, which propose to do something practical about existing or potential Communist action as distinct from Communist thought, could and should have been enacted as separate legislation.

Instead, they were lumped in with, or tacked on to, other proposals that in our view are unworkable and, in a very real sense, un-American. In its broad prohibitions, its sweeping registration requirements, its narrow-minded immigration and naturalization clauses, the new law represents a long step away from the American tradition of liberty and freedom. We believe in legislation that would prevent the Communists from doing harm to our country, but not in legislation that is self-defeating, diversionary and undiscriminating. President Truman performed an act of genuine courage in vetoing this bill. And so did the handful of Democrats and Republicans who voted against it.

However, the measure is now the law of the land. We think that many of its deficiencies will soon show up in the effort to enforce it. One of the fine features about a democracy is that error can be rectified before it is too late. And so we may hope that some of the more unwise and impractical provisions of this law will in due time be modified by Congress in a moment of calmer thinking and more reasoned reflection.

[From the Springfield (Ohio) Sun of September 28, 1950]

ON THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT

Apparently Congress wants to make certain that the American people know it is opposed to communism. To prove it, the legislators last week passed what they believe to be an anti-Communist measure, overriding a Presidential veto in the process. However, there are many Americans who feel that the lawmakers in their zeal to neutralize the forces of communism in the United States have instead given aid and comfort to those who would destroy us.

Congressmen claim that the Internal Security Act of 1950 will serve the Government well in keeping tabs on Reds within our borders. They say it will help the executive branch weed undesirable immigrants from the desirable ones and decide questions of citizenship qualifications. This law, according to Congressmen, will do numerous things to strengthen America's internal security.

President Truman, in his veto message to Congress, explains in length why he feels that the net result of the Internal Security Act will be to help the Communist, not hurt them. He points out, almost painstakingly, that there are already laws which give us most of the protection we need from the real dangers of treason, espionage, sabotage, and actions looking to the overthrow of our Government by force or violence. The new legislation, the President declares, hinders the Department of Justice and its Federal Bureau of Investigation, causing these agencies to waste immense amounts of time and energy attempting to carry out its unworkable registration provisions. Moreover, the subversive bill gives Government officials vast powers to harass all of our citizens in the exercise of their right to free speech.

This last point deserves particular attention. Among the major provisions of the Security Act is one requiring the registration of the Communist Party and its individual members, as well as all Red-front organizations. A front organization is defined as "a group of persons * * * permanently or temporarily associated together for joint action" pursuing "from time to time" a policy similar to that of the Communist Party. Thus, to use President Truman's example, a group favoring low-cost housing for sincere humanitarian reasons might be classified as a Communist-front organization, according to the Internal Defense Act.

Congress acted unwisely, to say the least, in passing this act in its present form. The American people may rightfully expect our lawmakers to provide adequate legal defenses against sabotage or espionage by Reds. In protecting our Nation from such activities, however, they must exercise special care in seeing to it that America's traditional liberties are not endangered. Congress has, in its endeavor to isolate the Communist Party, enacted a law which could do great damage to the democratic structure of the United States. The lawmakers should correct their mistake at the earliest possible moment.

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution of September 25, 1950]

A SCATTERGUN WHERE A RIFLE IS NEEDED

Most people—even Congressmen—will admit that the problem is to curb Communists and their sympathizers without unduly jeopardizing the liberties of patriotic Americans.

By that standard it is obvious that the Communist control bill which the Congress overwhelmingly passed over the President's veto is badly lacking.

Mr. Truman's objections to the bill were based on the advice of Federal agencies, including the FBI, which will be charged with its enforcement. The House hardly paused to hear the President's long message. The Senate vote came after a protracted filibuster—conducted, incidentally, by the very Senators who customarily heap scorn on southern Senators for filibustering. But that is beside the point here.

Instead of providing a rifle for cutting down real Communists and fellow-travelers—which is what is needed—the Congress-approved act puts a scattergun into the hands of Federal bureaucrats. A great many innocent persons are apt to get hurt by pellets exploding all over the landscape.

The registration and reporting provisions are apt to bring the most trouble. As the President pointed out, real Communists will use every delaying tactic available while a great many patriots will be subjected to embarrassment and injustice.

The law even demands that security be violated. It calls for a Federal register of all Defense Establishments from which Communists would be barred. Thus the Communists are given a public catalog of our most vital defense installations.

As bad as the bill is, it could have been made acceptable with a few amendments. Perhaps Congress can be persuaded to accept such amendments when it reconvenes and before too much damage has been done.

[From the Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer of October 1, 1950]

IT IS THE LAW

Although he vetoed the 1950 Internal Security Act, popularly known as the anti-Communist law, President Truman and Attorney General McGrath have lost no time in making it clear that the administration will enforce the law to the best of its ability so long as it remains on the statute books.

This is the proper attitude, not only for the administration, but for all citizens as well.

President Truman, other administration officials, Members of Congress, and citizens generally were well within their rights in opposing the passage of the bill. In fact, they had much the best of the argument, though not the necessary votes in Congress. The measure, even, if it should be as effective as its sponsors claim in combating communism, establishes too high a price in the deprivation of rights of innocent people—rights that have made the United States a free country and which have been the proudest boast of all Americans. In addition to that, there is grave doubt of the effectiveness of the law. It is also doubtful if it can be enforced no matter how conscientious the efforts in that direction.

Opponents of the measure will also be well within their rights in seeking its repeal or amendment by the next session of Congress.

But the law is the law. This is a government of laws. It does not lie with any official or any citizen to distinguish between good laws and bad laws. President Truman and Attorney General McGrath have given full recognition to that fact. Others should follow their example.

[From the St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times of September 3, 1950]

A BAD LAW ON THE BOOKS

There is no point in arguing further about the anti-Red bill President Truman vetoed. The House overwhelmingly and immediately overrode the veto, waiting impatiently till Mr. Truman's message was read, taking no time to weigh his arguments. The Senate seems sure to follow suit.

The law is a bad law, but it is virtually on the books.

The law is a bad law for reasons that the President's veto message ably stated. It is not inconsistent to argue, as he did, that the law would at the same time not hit many Communists but might hit many innocent persons. When shot is scattered guilty persons are frequently unharmed while innocent persons are struck. The effectiveness of the law against the Reds will require proving that the nonregistered accused are Reds; in the trial of Harry Bridges we have a good example of how difficult that can be. The danger of the law to innocent persons lies in the likelihood of false accusation; in the smears of Senator MCCARTHY we have a good example of how great this likelihood is.

The law is virtually on the books for several reasons. The main one undoubtedly is that, as Senator SCOTT LUCAS said last night, the American people want a stiff anti-Red bill, without carefully considering either what is being defended or how best to defend it.

A secondary reason is that the foes of President Truman, within both parties, wanted to put him on the spot. If he signed the bill they could claim they forced him to do so. If he vetoed the bill they could hold his veto against him.

President Truman took the honest and courageous course of vetoing it.

How much will his veto hurt him? There is much for which Mr. Truman should be, has been, and will be justifiably criticized. It will be ironic and unjust indeed if he is damaged seriously by what is undoubtedly a most brave and statesmanlike stand.

But his foes should not judge their success on this point too certain. Harry Truman is the man who started the Greek-Turkish program against communism. He is the man who set up the Federal loyalty program. He is the man whose administration created the Marshall plan and the North Atlantic Pact. He is the man who made the decision to battle against communism in Korea. It will not be possible to pin a pro-Red tag on him.

Now the important thing is for the American people to be alert against abuses of this hodgepodge and vague law. One of the first things needed is to set up some kind of an appeal system within which organizations labeled as Communist-front organizations can defend themselves if they want to.

The processes of democracy are mysterious. When authority is needed the Government can usually find the power even when laws are not on the books. When broad powers are granted that the Government does not want to abuse, frequently it does not do so. Let us hope that this will be the case in the present instance. Maybe the passing of the law will give the American people a kind of emotional purging so that we can get on with the job of guarding against the Reds without destroying the values that the Reds are attacking.

[From the Des Moines (Iowa) Register of September 26, 1950]

DANGERS OF THE NEW SECURITY LAW

One law does not change the character of a society, and the new internal security law will not turn America into a police state. Yet we would be inexcusably naive if we did not recognize this measure as bordering dangerously close to totalitarian-type police controls. It places a great deal of our individual freedom at the discretion of the President and his administrative officials.

We have never before been willing to place such wholesale authority in the hands of the executive branch.

An overwhelming majority of the people apparently believes that the threat to our security is so great we must take this risk. This in itself should be a warning to us, lest in our hysteria we further weaken the traditional and constitutional safeguards to our liberty.

We can lose our freedom by majority vote quite as easily—perhaps more easily—than by a minority clique seizing power.

Under the new law the President can declare an emergency in case of an "insurrection within the United States in behalf of a foreign enemy." A panicky President could interpret "insurrection" quite loosely, especially if egged on by a scared public. President Truman once wanted to draft railroad employees into the Army, in order to put down a strike.

In an emergency, any person whom the authorities "have reasonable ground to believe * * * will engage in, or probably conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or sabotage" can be arrested. Anyone so held is entitled to a hearing within 48 hours, and can appeal to a review board and the courts. What is new about this provision is that the Government can round up people on suspicion only.

But even this so-called concentration-camp power probably is not as dangerous, practically, as the extremely harsh methods set forth for dealing with aliens. The Attorney General is given absolute authority to prevent admission of an alien, without even having to disclose the basis for his ruling. Aliens who are members of any totalitarian party in any foreign country are barred. Even suspected Communist "sympathizers" are barred.

Any alien naturalized after January 1 will have his citizenship revoked, moreover, if he becomes a member of any group which would have disqualified him as a citizen at the time he was naturalized. This means any group classified as a "Communist front." Any alien who has been a member of such a front within the last 10 years must withdraw within 3 months after it is so classified, or he cannot become a citizen.

But what is a "front"? Organizations which are classified as "fronts," and thus required to register with the Attorney General, are designated by a Subversive Activities Control Board of five members appointed by the President.

Organizations and individuals, it is true, can appeal this designation to the Board and to the courts. But many innocent people are bound to be caught in this wide net. And it may take them years to remove the stigma, even if they are exonerated in court.

If we could always count on wise administration, probably none of these new powers would need alarm us greatly. But it takes little imagination to envision almost intolerable harassment under them.

Suppose the Attorney General and the Subversive Control Board should be men of the McCarthy-Schoeppel stripe. It would be possible for such men to conduct a virtual reign of terror, throwing people into prison for failure to register, for making false statements, etc. They could keep the law enforcement agencies and the courts so loaded with work that many real Communists could carry on their espionage unheeded.

That is the danger, of course. We have decided to risk it, in the urgency of the present world situation. But let us not forget that the risk is there.

[From the Des Moines (Iowa) Register of October 5, 1950]

SILLY REQUIREMENT IN THE SPY LAW

The new Communist-control law, passed overwhelmingly by Congress over President Truman's veto, requires the manager of a defense plant to post a notice stating that the plant is producing war materials, if the Secretary of Defense directs it.

The purpose of the notice would be to warn Communists and fellow travelers that if they try to get a job in the plant—or actually get one—they are violating the law and can be sent to prison. The law says that Communists and fellow travelers may not work in defense plants, but that workers shall be informed which are defense factories.

If put into practice, this would serve the Communist espionage system admirably. It would furnish spies accurate information on where to look for facts on our military plans. It would enable them to build up an ideal strategic-bombing map for Soviet Russia.

The law does not require an employer to screen his employees. The responsibility for that is properly on the FBI and military counterintelligence. But with thousands of factories beginning defense work, it will be a staggering task for these police agencies to check several million workers.

Of course, most plants producing large war equipment cannot be hidden very well, anyway. But there are many small plants, subcontracting vital parts, which are unknown even to their own workers. If they are unlabeled, spies may never be attracted to them. It is often these small factories, producing key parts, which are the best targets for sabotage

For this reason, Defense Secretary Marshall probably will not require defense-plant managers to put tags on their factories for the convenience of spies. But the provision is in the law and a panicky administration might do it some time in the future.

THE VETO MESSAGE

Only time can tell whether Congress has made the terrible mistake which President Truman believes it made by passing the so-called Communist-control bill over his veto.

But certainly Congress did not give the veto message the careful consideration which it deserved, and for which Mr. Truman had sent a personal plea to each member.

It was an exceedingly impressive message. Its tone was temperate. Its statement of the principle that this free country should punish men for crimes they commit, but never for opinions they have, was eloquent.

Its explanation of the reasons why the President felt compelled to disapprove the bill after huge majorities of both parties in both branches of Congress had voted for it was painstaking and persuasive.

Yet the adjournment-headed House hardly could wait for its reading clerk to drone through the message before starting its roll-call vote to override the veto.

And though the Senate went into a 24-hour session, there was little more evidence there of open-minded willingness to discuss the President's arguments on their merits.

Mr. Truman may be mistaken in his opinion—an opinion which, he said, also is held by the Departments of Justice, Defense, and State, and the Central Intelligence Agency—that the law which now goes on the statute books will help, not hurt, the Communists.

The dangers which he sees in this legislation—dangers to national security, to America's relations with other friendly nations, to the rights of all citizens—may be less than he believes. Or may be nonexistent.

Laws previously enacted may be—and in this newspaper's opinion are—less adequate than Mr. Truman thinks to protect the country from "the real dangers of treason, espionage, sabotage, and actions looking to the overthrow of our Government by force and violence."

And unquestionably the votes in Congress on this bill reflect a heavily predominant belief among the American people that strong and comprehensive new legislation is needed.

But legislation enacted in such times of stress as these can be, and in other such times has been, too comprehensive and too strong to be wise and safe. The people and their Congress cannot afford to be too sure that Mr. Truman is mistaken.

At the moment, however, Congress has had its way, and its Members are scattering to their homes and their campaigns.

When they assemble again late in November they should give Mr. Truman's veto message the thoughtful attention just denied it in the adjournment rush. And if, in the calmer postelection light, they see that the new law does go perilously too far, they should be resolutely prepared to admit and rectify their errors.

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., of September 25, 1950]

THE GREATER DANGER

Some sections of the McCarran subversives control bill are unnecessary and dangerous. The overwhelming margins by which Congress repassed this legislation over President Truman's veto—286 to 48 in the House, 57 to 10 in the Senate—are sobering and frightening. Congress seems to be saying to the people, "You do not know what danger confronts you."

Yet, one cannot accept the premise that the Communist international conspiracy, and that alone, motivated Congress to force into the hands of the President powers he did not want to use—police-state methods including concentration camps for suspected citizens in wartime—to protect the Nation against subversives. There were other factors of motivation.

To a considerable extent, this last action of Congress before most of its Representatives and a third of its Senator returned to face the voters, constituted a declaration of its independence from domination by the executive branch. Even the leaders of the administration forces in Congress joined in defying the President. It was a last chance to prove that Congress wears no one's collar.

At the same time Congress was disavowing to the public any responsibility for what Communist infiltration there may be in the Government. Uncertain about what impact the Alger Hiss conviction, the McCarthy charges against the State Department, and other questions of loyalty raised from time to time, may have made on the public mind, Congress by approving the McCarran bill over the Presidential veto put itself on record. Congress is for democracy and motherhood; it is against communism. A good sound platform.

But we think there is less of hysteria among the people than among many Members of Congress respecting the Communist menace and proper ways to meet it. We do not know very many people who are ready to give up their rights of free thought, free speech and a free press to a Government police system intended to preserve those very rights which have been sacrificed.

The McCarran bill, which could become the most repressive law ever enacted by Congress in the hands of administrators who believe police-state methods are necessary or desirable, represents a grave departure from the moral and political principles on which this free Nation was founded. We do not believe it will survive the adverse reaction of the people, for very long. But it is much more difficult to get rid of a police state than to stop its development in earlier stages.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of September 30, 1950]

GET RID OF UNWANTED SECTIONS OF THE ANTI-RED BILL

President Truman has taken the proper position in announcing that he will be in no hurry to carry out the provisions of the anti-subversive bill requiring publication of defense plants from which Communists are to be barred.

Such listing would be an open invitation to sabotage of key installations. Senator MCCARRAN, one of the principal sponsors of the bill, has tried to offset criticism by saying that the order for publications is not mandatory. But if that is the case, why have the provision at all? It points again to the hasty and ill-considered fashion in which the bill was tossed together and passed over the President's veto.

Representative CLARENCE CANNON, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, has submitted a modified bill that could very well be the foundation for a new law.

It would remove the order for public listing of defense plants and would eliminate the most controversial provision, that requiring the registration of Communists and Communist-front organizations. As the Communists intend to challenge this requirement in the courts, it might not become effective, at best, for several years.

Mr. CANNON'S proposed amendment would strengthen the clause in the McCarran bill authorizing the detention of Communists and other subversives in time of war and would protect the FBI from the necessity of disclosing confidential sources of information which the present bill would demand.

It would empower the President to designate areas where security regulations could be enforced; prevent interference with effective loyalty programs; authorize the heads of Government agencies to dismiss employees without delay or interference when national security is involved; extend the statute of limitations for prosecution of violations of espionage laws; and tighten up laws dealing with the deportation of aliens and the registration of foreign agents.

New and improved laws are needed to cope with espionage, sabotage, and Communist activity in this country, but the major terms of the McCarran Act, stumbling, cumbersome and unworkable, would handicap instead of help the Government in this connection.

The unwanted sections of the bill should be weeded out as soon as possible and a practicable measure along the lines mapped out by Congressman CANNON adopted.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., of September 27, 1950]

NOW THAT IT'S LAW

The McCarran anti-Communist bill has become the law of the land. Some of it is good law—needed law; some of it is bad law—very bad. It is a pity that these diverse provisions were not submitted in separate bills. But they were all wrapped together in one package.

It is needed law, for instance, to extend the statute of limitations on espionage to 10 years, to define more realistically the crime of divulging Government secrets, and to spell out in law the authority, methods, and safeguards for rounding up and impounding subversives and enemy sympathizers in event of grave emergency.

It is bad law to lead the American people into a false sense of security (into the assumption that dangerous Communists and hired enemy agents will dutifully come forward, register, and stay put), to overburden the FBI with checking up on "front" membership lists and nabbing reluctant registrants when it needs all its resources to track down saboteurs and interstate criminals.

Perhaps most of all, it is bad law to inject into the American system legal concepts and administrative machinery which, in the wrong hands, could effectively smother any kind of reform movement so long as it was still a small minority and unpopular at the moment with the majority.

This last danger has been the most difficult to make clear. And it heightens rather than dims the political courage displayed by a handful of Congressmen and the President in going on record against the bill to say that many conscientious legislators, up for election, felt themselves under irresistible pressure from unquestionably patriotic constituents who simply would not understand a vote against any measure which purported to "get at" the Communists.

Be that as it may. The best way to correct the bad features of a law is to enforce them firmly and honestly along with the good, and we welcome Attorney General J. Howard McGrath's assurance that he will do just that. The Federal courts continue to give evidence that they are forgetting neither the letter nor the spirit of the Bill of Rights. And there are already signs that, after the elections, quite a few in Congress who voted for the McCarran bill may then feel free to support correcting amendments.

[From the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal of September 29, 1950]

LAW NEEDS CHANGING

American Communists have announced their anticipated defiance of the newly enacted McCarran Control Act, but we advise our readers that no purpose is served in getting angry at that. Normally, when the domestic brand of commies start breathing their revolutionary fire, our own blood pressure rises to an explosive point. But not this time.

Calmer second thought and a little reading of the veto measure ignored at the time the President's action was overridden has already convinced many Members of the Congress that they have made a mistake and put the Government in position of having to enforce a law it regards as unenforceable and is. Nevertheless it must make the costly, diversionary effort from which only the Communists can possibly gain.

The act plays American security agencies right into the commies' hands, for instead of being able to concentrate on Communist spies and saboteurs and on plans for an emergency round-up of Reds, the highly skilled investigative agents used in counter-Communist undertakings will have to be diverted to determining whether or not this or that tenth-rate Red has registered, in prosecuting him if he has not and to doing the thousands and one things the act will require in the investigative field. The irony of the situation is that the real Communist enemies will now go underground and years of investigative work will, in many instances, be undone.

Some of the wiser leaders of the Congress are planning to seek modification of the act when the vacation-minded Congress gets back on the job, and that cannot be too soon.

[From the Washington Post of October 6, 1950]

MCCARRAN REVISION

Nine Democratic Senators who supported the President's veto of the McCarran Act have joined in a statement calling for the repeal or drastic modification of the law when Congress reconvenes at the end of November. It may be taken more or less for granted, judging from the size of the votes by which the President's veto was overridden in the Senate and the House, that outright repeal is out of the question for the present. Modification may reasonably be hoped for, however, in the light of the law's extravagances. Already these extravagances are creating extremely awkward problems which were certainly not foreseen by many of the act's sponsors. The immigration provisions in particular will have to be revised if embarrassing diplomatic difficulties are to be avoided.

It is possible that Congress will be able to take a sober second look at this legislation when it reconvenes. For one thing, the election will be out of the way by then. For another, the excitement stirred up by the Korean war will have somewhat abated. Perhaps Congress will be able 2 months hence to examine the measure dispassionately; to hold hearings on some of its drastic features, drafted and passed with scarcely a semblance of inquiry into their consequences; and to vote on amendments with at least diminished partisanship. It is shocking to reflect that the unprecedented detention provisions and the fanatical immigration restrictions of the act were adopted without any testimony whatever as to their constitutionality and probable effects.

The chief problem in getting some rational revision of the McCarran Act is to provide a rational climate for discussion of it. It must have been concern over this problem that prompted the nine Democratic supporters of the President to warn advocates of repeal against any association with Communist-sponsored attacks on the measure. We have no doubt that Communist-sponsored attacks contributed greatly to enactment of the law; we have little doubt, either, that this was their intended result. For the law undermines American institutions more damagingly than anything the Communists themselves could accomplish. "We are not interested in protecting Communists," the proponents of repeal declared. "We are interested in protecting both the security and the freedom of America."

Analysis of Second Quarter Reports, 1950 Lobbying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, an analysis of the quarterly reports filed under the Federal Lobbying Act for the second quarter for 1950 is now available. Two hundred and twenty organizations reported spending more than $3,000,000 in the 3-month period to influence the passage or defeat of legislation, directly or indirectly. In addition, 746 agents filed reports for that quarter listing more than $1,300,000 in salaries and expenses. The analysis follows:

FILINGS PURSUANT TO THE FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT FOR THE SECOND QUARTER, 1950

Organizations: $4,815,835.51 contributions and $3,174,719.68 expenditures reported.

Of the 704 organizations represented in the above totals, 220 organizations filed reports in their own names. In the case of 484 organizations, it was necessary to obtain the expenditures from the reports filed by their agents. Fifty-two organizations registered during this quarter.

Agents: $1,049,918.62 salaries and $282,131.75 expenditures reported by agents.

Seven hundred and forty-six reports were filed by agents during this quarter.

Seventy-six agents registered during the quarter.

Seven hundred and four organizations are represented by filings.

The salaries and expenditures for agents include amounts taken from organizations reports in instances where the organization filed and gave pertinent data, but the agents did not file.

This analysis is based on reports for the second quarter filed up to and including July 20, 1950: The Clerk's office has indicated that more than 60 reports for the second quarter have been returned to the organizations and individuals filing, because such reports had been prepared on the old A and C forms instead of on the form issued March 31, 1950. The figures given in those reports were not available for inclusion in this analysis.

A number of the organizations and individuals state that the money as received and expended was for all purposes and that none of it was earmarked for legislative purposes.

I Cannot Urge Too Strongly Upon the Businessmen of This Country the Folly of Increasing Prices, nor Upon the Workingmen of This Country the Folly of Demanding Wage Increases, Except as Such Increases Are Necessary To Take Care of Specific Inequities and Particular Situations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Charles Sawyer, Secretary of Commerce, some months ago paid a visit to our Southland and addressed a great gathering of people in Mobile, Ala.

His was a great address. I shall always remember his talk as one of the most factual, analytical, and discursive talks that I have ever heard. He not alone discussed commerce and trade as they currently affected the United States national economy, but he discussed agriculture, finance, taxation, and the management of public debt in the light of world-wide conditions.

I remember that, at the conclusion of that speech, one of my friends said to me: "Congressman FRANK, there stands a great man, a great American, and certainly one of the greatest public officials that has ever served the people of these United States."

Mr. Speaker, it is almost inconceivable that any man could be as fully informed and so constructively interested in so many facets of the Nation's economy as Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer, a Democrat of whom the Republicans in Congress are frank to call the best Secretary of Commerce that this country ever had.

Mr. Speaker, the September 23 issue of the Saturday Evening Post carried a story written by its Washington editor, Mr. Beverly Smith, entitled "Truman's Most Surprising Adviser." The story is about Secretary Sawyer, who was nominated and assumed his office nearly 30 months ago. There was then no talk of any Korean warfare, and yet, with uncanny foresight, complete discernment and understanding about domestic as well as international affairs, he grappled briskly with such intractable problems as export controls, voluntary allocation of steel, aid for small business, the modernization of transportation laws and statutes, and the need for a reappraisal of our now too-rigid antimonopoly statutes.

Mr. Speaker, in the Scriptures it is written down that "A prophet is not without honor save in his own country," and, true to character, Secretary Sawyer made his first public address before an advertising group in his own home town of Cincinnati, Ohio.

In that speech, he bluntly and frankly declared:

> I took this job because I am convinced that the work of the Department of Commerce is vital to the national welfare. It is vital because its primary function is to help American business, and I believe that the success of American business is essential to the operation of our social, economic, and governmental systems. * * * My chief responsibility is to help business and businessmen—not any one kind or group, but all business groups and interests in all parts of the country.

In the light of what he told that advertising group in Cincinnati, and the great work which he has since accomplished in the administration of his Department along the lines that he then laid down, is it any wonder that President Truman did, at the request of American businessmen everywhere, choose to repose in this great public official all control of materials deemed needful and necessary to secure the Nation's defenses and the peace of the world?

Mr. Speaker, Secretary Sawyer quite recently made still another talk to the Association of National Advertisers. That talk I regard as one of the finest explanations of the complex conditions that confront this country with respect to its national production of civilian and military goods that could possibly come out of the pen or out of the mind of man.

No words of mine could possibly overemphasize the abilities or the capabilities of Secretary Sawyer to handle his present job or any other job within the gift or bestowal either of the President of the United States or of the American people themselves.

Mr. Speaker, Secretary Sawyer's choice of his assistants bespeaks, more than words can tell, his wonderful abilities as an executive and as an administrator. In his choice of William Henry Harrison, he has brought back into Washington one of America's recognized top-flight captains of industry to head up and handle the tremendous task of administering the National Production Authority now reposed in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. Harrison, NPA Administrator, is certainly no stranger to any of us who sit on either side of the aisle or on both ends of this Capitol. We knew him as president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Co., and later as president of the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp.

We know him best as Maj. Gen. "Bill" Harrison, who distinguished himself by his service as Chief of Procurement and Distribution Division of the United States Army Signal Corps in the Armed Services Forces during World War II.

We shall always remember him as a strict disciplinarian, a good officer, a great administrator, and, above all else, as a splendid gentleman.

The hundreds of us—Members of both Houses and their families, who were in attendance, will never forget the physical evidences we saw the night we were invited to the Pentagon to look upon what had, in part, been achieved by General Harrison through conservation in the procurement of military supplies.

There, stretched out in the main ring or corridor of that great structure—then new to Washington—we saw fragments of metal, plastic, and other organic and inorganic matters, thousands upon thousands of them, that had been brought into production to serve this country more cheaply and better than did other scarce critical and strategic materials and methods that had historically been used in the production of the accoutrements of war.

I well remember the statistics which evidenced the fact that more than a billion and a half dollars had been saved—by his foresight and administration—through the conservation of millions of man-hours of labor, the substitution of one material for another, through standardization of parts, through simplification of design, by way of reclamation, by the use of die castings that obviated expensive machine labor, the welding of stamped parts to replace those parts that had long been machined out of solid metals and at great expense. Additionally thereto were a host of improved methods of platings and inhibitors, together with a veritable catalog of other variations and changes that then promised to make, and since have made, life more economical and better for every man, woman, and child in these United States. He is a worthy assistant to a great man.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend to the reading of every Member of this Congress the article written by Beverly Smith, Washington editor of the Saturday Evening Post, around the Secretary of Commerce, Hon. Charles Sawyer, entitled "Truman's Most Surprising Adviser."

At the same time I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues here in this House to extend my remarks and insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the wonderful address of our great Secretary of Commerce on mobilizing for defense, which reads as follows:

My last meeting with the members of this great advertising association was on March 31 of this year when you joined the membership of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, at White Sulphur Springs. Most of us were optimistic about the future; we had successfully weathered a slight recession in 1949 and the economy was again surging upward.

On June 25 the Communist army of North Korea attacked without warning the free people of the Republic of Korea. Following prompt condemnation of this act by the United Nations Security Council, we undertook to implement their decision with men and with weapons. Since then, we have become increasingly aware of the tremendous burdens which have fallen upon government, upon business, and upon our people.

Recently, the news from the battlefront has been encouraging. We are proud of the men who are engaged in this bloody and bitter struggle. However, for those at home pride is not enough—we must give the men at the front our all-out support.

We have two jobs to do: First, to place in the hands of those at the front all the weapons they need to do their job; second, to keep our civilian economy strong. If business can contribute its full share to these two great tasks it will gain for itself a place of high honor.

Two weeks ago the President delegated to various Government agencies powers given to him under the Defense Production Act of 1950. He delegated to the Secretary of Commerce allocation, priority and requisitioning powers over many of the key materials and commodities of our economy. That difficult assignment makes it proper for me to talk with you about the task which lies ahead and the manner in which we propose to use the powers we have received. It is important that the public—and in particular businessmen—be fully informed as to what the Government proposes to do and why.

First, may I say a word as to the President's policy of delegating the control functions to existing agencies. It is clear that the important fact is not the name of the agency but the name of the man in charge. There are some, inexperienced in practical affairs, who believe that the prompt and easy solution to any Government problem is the magnificent gesture of organizing a new agency, giving it a big name and plenty of money, and calling in some celebrity to "run the show." Such an action is justified only when top-level men in government are incompetent.

Furthermore it does not by any means automatically produce the desired result. Occasionally the "big shot" picked out of the air proves a great disappointment. He may be demanding, egotistical, and ineffective.

There are many advantages in utilizing existing agencies. In the first place, there is the prosaic, but important, matter of money. The creation of a new agency is always expensive. As a rule, it is necessary to give special income advantages to those who enter a new agency. We have experienced that in the Commerce Department, where men were lured from their jobs—or at least were tempted—by larger salaries, opportunities for travel, and other advantages not furnished within the existing agencies.

Furthermore it is far more difficult for Congress or the Executive to keep down mushrooming tendencies of a new agency, where one has no precedent to serve as a guide and the claims of necessity are hard to answer. Not only is such a move expensive from the standpoint of dollars but it is expensive from the standpoint of efficient Government operation.

A new agency, of course, draws much of its personnel from outside of Government, and in many cases that personnel is not of the highest quality. Except where superior talents are persuaded to do a job of this sort on the basis of public service, those who come are not too keenly demanded by industry. In other words, the agency gets the people that industry is willing to let go.

However, a large contribution of experience and competence is bound to come from the people who have, over the years, done the job in Government. To the extent that the new agencies recruit their personnel from the existing agencies—which must, in the long run, carry on the functions of Government—the regular agencies are deprived of some of their best men, morale is adversely affected, and efficiency is substantially reduced.

Not only is this procedure expensive but, by and large, a better job can be done by existing Government agencies. They are already organized. They don't need to undertake the desperate hunt for space, for talent, for equipment.

I can illustrate the point with my own experience. As soon as it was indicated that the President would ask for control powers and that at least some of them would come to the Department of Commerce, we began to organize a new unit in the Department, using the experience and talents of those in the Department who had done this same work throughout World War II. The records and many of the personnel of the War Production Board of World War II were transferred to the Department of Commerce some years ago. It was, therefore, a simple matter to put these men at work on a program for meeting the present situation.

In this endeavor I have undertaken to avoid previous mistakes and benefit by experience. To head up the activity it was clear that we should, if possible, get the services of a man of recognized ability, but also one who had been through this work before and would know what he was doing as soon as he took over. With the help of the business advisory council of the Department of Commerce, many of whom spent practically the entire period of World War II in Government work in Washington, we were able to persuade one of the top businessmen in the country—William Henry Harrison—to leave his high position in the business world and undertake the job of Administrator of the National Production Authority in the Department of Commerce. Those who argue that you cannot set up an enterprise of this sort within the existing agencies say that competent and top-level men won't come to take jobs within the existing agency framework. This is, of course, not true, as Mr. Harrison has proved.

We were also able to secure the services of Mr. Manly Fleischmann, who was first assistant to John Lord O'Brian, General Counsel of the WPB during World War II. Mr. Fleischmann has given up a very lucrative law practice in Buffalo and come to Washington at a great sacrifice in personal income to occupy the important post of General Counsel for the NPA.

Now, as to controls. In a war there are two fronts, the battle and the home front. The purpose of the NPA will be to carry on this home-front fight so that the boys at the battle front get the things they need.

The happy period of peace and prosperity which we enjoyed since the close of World War II is, for the time being at least, at an end. There is no advantage in pretending otherwise. Regardless of the outcome of the battle in Korea, we have embarked upon a program which will put critical strains upon our domestic economy. Serious shortages, heavy taxes, and problems of inflation will tax our ingenuity and self-control and strength to the utmost; and this will go on for years.

Those who think that the end of this present emergency will relieve us of concern for the future are victims of self-delusion; those who fear that the imposition of controls will rob us of our liberties are poor appraisers of the quality of liberty, or lack of it, which will be forced upon us if we fail in this undertaking of self-discipline.

The National Production Authority is now under way, but the great bulk of activity, of course, lies ahead of it. We have only begun the task. Our first order was a so-called inventory control, the purpose of which was to prevent unreasonable accumulation of inventories beyond the normal requirements of business.

Other orders will follow shortly. We are making every effort to impose as little hardship as possible upon business, but where it is necessary we will not hesitate to impose it.

In one respect we shall depart from previous practice. There has been some tendency in Government to reject a man who knows a lot about the line of business he is dealing with. In the last war it was not uncommon to assign a man who had spent his whole life in the copper business to an office in charge of wallpaper or plastics. This is bad administration, to say the least. The man who knows most about the copper business and how to conduct it is the man who has been in that business. There are some so suspicious of American businessmen that they feel the use of men who are familiar with a particular business will inevitably bring about crooked favoritism. I do not believe businessmen are any more honest than other people, nor do I believe they are any less honest—nor any less imbued with a sense of public service. I feel that, for the most part, they will come to whatever jobs are given them with a high sense of public duty, and where I find that this is not the case they will be promptly removed and punished.

Furthermore, the whole concept I am discussing is stupid; if a man is dishonest he is as likely to be dishonest in a field other than his own as in a field with which he is familiar; and if he is uninformed as well as dishonest he is certainly more likely to be an easy mark for unscrupulous practitioners.

One of the problems with which we are dealing now, and will continue to deal, is the question of increasing our productive capacity. We must, and we will, see that this is done. It should not be done, however, hysterically or foolishly.

As we discuss this question, it is well to bear in mind certain encouraging facts, as of today. Never in our history have be been so strong, never has our national production been so high, never has the diversity of employment, plant location, and sources of supply been so extensive. Our national production at the moment is running at the rate of over $280,000,000,000 per year, and in the 5 years since 1945 American business has built and added to its productive facilities $115,000,000,000 of new plants and equipment.

In 1940, we were completely dependent upon natural rubber from abroad. Today, we have a synthetic-rubber industry which is being rapidly expanded and which is producing hundreds of thousands of tons of rubber per year.

Today, the domestic and Western Hemisphere reserves of oil are practically unlimited.

Our transportation system has a capacity far greater than prior to World War II. In 1939 to 1941 American-flag vessels in the overseas trade totaled 563. Today, including reserve fleets, we now have more than five times as many ships, with a gross tonnage proportionately greater.

In machine tools, our present production is utilizing only one-half of the available capacity.

We have a vast addition to our plant capacity, and it is much better distributed than in 1940. The shift of population toward the West has been accompanied by a shift in industry locations. It is much easier to operate in the Pacific than it was in 1940 and 1941, as we have already demonstrated in the few short weeks since Korea.

We have thousands of airfields, shipyards, and other facilities available for use whose building in the early forties required a vast number of man hours and tremendous quantities of steel, cement, and other basic materials. These facilities are available to be converted without the drain on critical materials which was required to construct them in 1940, 1941, and 1942.

Furthermore, the most recent statistics given me by the Office of Business Economics in my Department indicate that plans for fixed investment in the second half of 1950 have been adjusted sharply upward, approximating $9,800,000,000, a figure close to the peak reached in the corresponding period of 1948 and 9 percent higher than in the second half of 1949.

Encouraging as these signs are, we are, however, faced—and will be faced—with many grim problems. We already have shortages of critical materials, and there is no reason to believe these shortages will be relieved in the near future. In fact, there is every reason to believe that many of them may grow. The news from Korea at the moment is encouraging; but this is no sham battle in which we are engaged. Those we fight mean business, and it is high time for all of us to realize that we must mean business too. The Communist control imposes rigid and ruthless discipline from the top. The ordinary man is not asked what he wants to do; he is told. To meet the coordinated effort which this type of discipline makes possible, we must be prepared to impose discipline upon ourselves.

It is completely unrealistic to assume that after a brief interval the problems we now face in Korea will be ended and we can go back to "business as usual." The chips are down. The use of this phrase indicates a game or a gamble. When you gamble, you take some chances; but it is our job to lengthen the odds in our favor. We want better than a gambler's chance to make secure the future of America and the future of civilization.

It is about time that all segments of our economy stop thinking about what they can demand and think about what they can give to save themselves and all of us from an unpleasant fate. Not only as groups, but as individuals, this theory must apply. It must apply in connection with prices, wages, and hoarding.

The matter of price and wage controls has not been given to me, and I shall not discuss it in any detail. The President's order sets up an Economic Stabilization Agency which will deal with these problems. I should like, however, to talk briefly about hoarding. We have been given the power to prosecute hoarders, and to requisition the things they are hoarding. These powers will be exercised, and I can pledge you that wrong-doers will be punished. In every situation and in every age there are people who try to profit from the misfortunes of others. There are those who are willing to take advantage of military demands to enrich themselves. We will undertake, as far as possible, to prevent this. We have already issued a so-called inventory order, putting 32 war materials under control. There must be no accumulation of materials beyond what is needed for normal production and stocks of controlled materials are to be held to a practicable minimum working inventory. Failure to observe this order, now in effect, will subject the offender to a heavy fine and imprisonment. Other materials will undoubtedly be added to this list as time goes on.

One fundamental objective of this developing program is, as I said before, to increase the supply of needed materials. We are not satisfied with present supplies, and are acquainting industry with that fact. We want a continually greater supply of every strategic material, so that we will have not only enough, but more than enough, of what we need.

I referred earlier in my talk to the item of steel. The morning when the NPA was set up, and Mr. Harrison sworn in, I held a meeting with the executives of all the top steel companies in the country, talked with them about the program, told them what we wanted, and asked them to tell me specifically at an early date what they were prepared to do in the way of an increase of steel capacity.

It is essential, of course, while pursuing our immediate military objective, to maintain our own economic strength. There are many problems involved, the most menacing of which, in my judgment, is the threat of inflation. By some device, by some method, we must prevent the inflationary spiral from getting out of control. If it isn't done by one method, it must be done by another. As President Truman said after outlining the vicious results of the inflationary spiral, "We must not let these things happen."

There are several ways in which we can fight the battle against inflation. One method calls for a reduction of the amount of dollars in circulation and the spending power of our people. The Federal Reserve Board has already imposed credit controls under the powers recently given them, and has stated publicly that these controls will be made more drastic if they do not produce early and substantial results. The President has repeatedly stated the need for strong credit controls in connection with housing.

Furthermore, we must expect heavy and continued taxation. One sound device for combating inflation is taxation, and it is highly desirable to pay as we go in this great effort in which we are now engaged. We can, therefore, look forward to heavy and continued tax burdens—all of us.

I shall not undertake to discuss the relative value of methods of taxation, but will leave that to the Treasury experts who are responsible for raising revenue.

If these and other similar methods fail—or perhaps even before they fail—it may be necessary to impose controls upon prices and wages. This is an unpleasant and exasperating procedure, but we may have to do it.

The law passed by Congress provides for an Office of Economic Stabilization which will administer these particular controls. I cannot urge too strongly upon the businessmen of this country the folly of increasing prices, nor upon the workingmen of this country the folly of demanding wage increases, except as such increases are necessary to take care of specific inequities and particular situations.

Every time a businessman increases his prices, and every time a labor group asks for increased wages, it adds to the strain. There are undoubtedly some situations where increases in prices and wages are justified—to readjust inequities. Aside from these infrequent situations, price and wage increases should be avoided.

A workingman who gets a 10-percent increase in his wages, with which he must meet a 12-percent increase in the cost of living, is worse off than he was before.

It is idle now to talk about battles between capital and labor in this country. Capital and labor must join forces in the real battle. If that is lost we all go down together.

I should like to say a word about the small-business man and the employees of the small-business man. It is highly desirable that this important part of our economy be given attention. There are almost 4,000,000 separate business units in these United States, and if a peacetime—or for that matter wartime—effort is to succeed these units must remain active and healthy. This should be the concern of government, and it should also be the concern of management and labor. Great corporations—Nation-wide in scope—and great labor organizations of similar scope—should have in mind the needs of the small-business man and the employees of the small-business man.

During World War II we recognized, belatedly, the need to have the skill and the effort and the brains of smaller business units at the disposal of our defense effort. As far as my part in the enterprise is concerned, I should like to recognize this need at an early, and not a late, stage of our preparation. Furthermore, it is highly desirable to recognize that our effective business units are not confined to manufacturing. There is a tendeny to ignore completely the function played by distribution in our peace and wartime economy. We cannot afford to overlook this part of the business world.

I have told you some unpleasant truths. In my opinion, the American people—all of them—can stand the truth; furthermore, in my opinion, the American people want the truth. If it is unpleasant, they prefer to know it early. There is a certain pleasing sensation which comes from telling people nice things. It is, however, time to forego that sensation and gain some satisfaction from the feeling that we are preparing the American people to base their future upon the solid foundation of reality.

Resolution of Catholic War Veterans, Department of Maryland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution of the Catholic War Veterans, Department of Maryland.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas many patriotic citizens and organizations strenuously objected to the original appointment of Dean Acheson as Secretary of State; and

Whereas the American public has become increasingly alarmed over his policy of cringing appeasement toward Communist aggression in the Far East; and

Whereas an irate electorate recently rebelled at his championing of a person formally adjudicated a Communist by a court of the United States; and

Whereas his policy of obsequiously surrendering to the outlaw demands of the Communists in Asia has been thoroughly and dramatically repudiated by the President of the United States; and

Whereas the aforesaid complete reversal of the policies he so stubbornly and dangerously advocated have destroyed whatever conceivable use he may have been to our country as a member of the President's Cabinet; and

Whereas, in our considered opinion, recent world developments and the best interests of our beloved country required his prompt removal from office: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Catholic War Veterans, Department of Maryland, in special meeting assembled this 29th day of June 1950, That the President of the United States be respectfully petitioned to request the immediate resignation of Dean Acheson as Secretary of State; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Hon. Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, to the press of Baltimore City, and to the national press services.

Program for a True Pay-as-You-Go Full-Coverage Social-Security System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, under permission to extend my remarks, I am placing in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of my program for a pay-as-you-go social-security system.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, there has come to my attention in recent years a deeply disturbing observation. People are saying that we are so far along the road to statism that we cannot possibly turn back, and so we might as well make the best of it. This, of course, is the most malicious nonsense.

If we are on the wrong road—and statism is the antithesis of democracy—then we must reorient ourselves. But we don't have to waste time going back. Far better, we can cut a new trail across country until we reach the right road off which we wandered.

Mr. President, it is because I sincerely believe that the road we are now traveling in regard to social security is leading us away from American ideals and toward ultimate national insecurity and disaster that I am suggesting a fresh approach to the entire problem.

I am proposing a full-coverage pay-as-you-go social-security program which would give more protection to more Americans than the Social Security Act amendments of 1950 and spell security rather than insecurity for our national economy.

The very real danger which lurks in the 1950 amendments is that we will be lulled into a false sense of social security on our home front, while girding ourselves for all-out defense of our American way of life from foreign attack.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall indicate the social, economic, and political pitfalls of our present system, as I see them, before offering you my substitute American Citizens Pension Plan.

SOCIAL INSECURITY

The bad features of our present system fall into three broad categories: (1) Inhumanities, injustices, and undemocratic discriminations; (2) economic unsoundness; and (3) political pressures.

So-called social security has been with us now for 15 years. Back in 1935, weary and discouraged from depression, many believed the promises then made by President Roosevelt that the magic formula of contributory, deferred-payment, social insurance would free us from the fear of poverty in old age. The Nation did not question where this fine scheme came from, nor examine carefully who was in and who was out—but passed the Social Security Act confident that, by virtue of compulsory contributions, it was purchasing, in a dignified manner, adequate retirement pensions. There would be no more poorhouses; no more public charity; no more of the humiliation and grief of the means test. Federal aid to the States for their old-age assistance programs was to be only a temporary expedient while old-age and survivors' insurance was being set up and perfected.

Now, after 15 years and the latest liberalizing amendments, what do we find?

We find a monster two-headed system, half federally administered, half State-administered, arbitrarily dividing the American people into two groups; those considered worthy of receiving old-age and survivors' insurance benefits as a right based on compulsory token contributions, and those considered unworthy, beyond the pale, without OASI rights or benefits.

To this latter group the system says: "If you are in need, declare yourself a pauper, prove you have no assets, no close relatives who might be forced to support you. Open your books. Let a paid social worker snoop around and look under the rug to see that you have nothing hidden. Then as a public ward, after long delay, you will be sent a check made up partly of State and local taxes, partly of Federal taxes. But if you should have the luck to earn a few dollars, you will be cut off and run the risk of losing your place on the list."

Out of our eleven and one-half million men and women over 65 today, only two and one-half million are receiving OASI benefits as a right. This figure includes some, but not all, of those 65 or over taken in by the new law. Of these, about 250,000 have been forced to undergo the means test to qualify for supplementary local public assistance because their OASI benefits are insufficient. Two million eight hundred thousand who have not qualified for OASI (although many of them may have contributed but a few dollars less than required) are on public assistance with all the indignity that that implies. And over 6,000,000 not qualified for OASI and too proud to apply for assistance receive neither the one nor the other. Many of them may be as worthy as those selected for the former and as needy as those subjected to the latter. In addition, according to the Bureau of the Census, the largest single group of these 6,000,000 forgotten old folks are widows who are not working and whose incomes range from $1,000 all the way down to zero.

The present situation is in process of change, since the new law became operative only recently (September 1, 1950). Even when all those now eligible for immediate benefits under the new act are brought onto the benefit lists, however, it is not expected to change this picture materially.

In short, even after the recent liberalizing amendments, out of some eleven and one-half million men and women over 65, we have only around two and one-half million receiving old-age insurance benefits, and the rest—over 9,000,000—receiving public assistance or nothing.

We have only to examine the record to find that in selecting the privileged Americans for OASI the system operates like a lottery, awarding benefits to those lucky enough to acquire "insured status" by working in covered employment the required number of calendar quarters and denying benefits to anyone who falls short by so much as a few dollars. Basically, however, the system discriminates against the young in favor of the old, against men and women who want to continue to work after 65 in favor of those who retire, against women in favor of men, and against the poor in favor of the rich.

As of January 1, 1951, of the estimated 82,000,000 men and women who will have contributed to OASI since the beginning, only around 60,000,000 will have fully insured status. It is true that the 1950 amendments will take in some 500,000 of the present aged and that increased coverage will make it less likely to lose status by going in and out of covered employment. Even so, the system will strike from the rolls anyone whom catastrophe strikes before he has acquired "insured status."

The amendments make it possible for a man of 62 or older to qualify for benefits at the bottom of the ladder, with six quarters and a total contribution of $4.50. For this $4.50 if he retires immediately after six quarters, he may receive a primary benefit of $20 per month for the rest of his days. If his wife is the same age, with the usual life expectancy of 13 years for him and 15 for her, they may net for that original $4.50 investment $4,826. However, a man 62 years old or older, earning $3,600 or over, would do even better. Under the same set of circumstances, he and his wife might expect to receive $17,373 worth of hand-outs from Uncle Sam—and these are conservative estimates. Under particular circumstances such as a greater number of dependents and longer years of life, the windfalls would come much higher.
